Such determination shall be made without regard to whether the agency performed an analysis under section 604. The purpose of the review shall be to determine whether such rules should be continued without change, or should be amended or rescinded, consistent with the stated objectives of applicable statutes, to minimize any adverse significant economic impacts or maximize any beneficial significant economic impacts on a substantial number of small entities. Such plan may be amended by the agency at any time by publishing the revision in the Federal Register and subsequently placing the amended plan on the agency’s website.

“(b) The plan shall provide for the review of all such agency rules existing on the date of the enactment of the Regulatory Flexibility Improvements Act of 2013 within 10 years of the date of publication of the plan in the Federal Register and for review of rules adopted after the date of enactment of the Regulatory Flexibility Improvements Act of 2013 within 10 years after the publication of the final rule in the Federal Register. If the head of the agency determines that completion of the review of existing rules is not feasible by the established date, the head of the agency shall so certify in a statement published in the Federal Register and may extend the review for not longer than 2 years after publication of notice of extension in the Federal Register. Such certification and notice shall be sent to the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration and the Congress.

“(c) The plan shall include a section that details how an agency will conduct outreach to and meaningfully include small businesses (including small business concerns owned and controlled by women, small business concerns owned and controlled by veterans, and small business concerns owned and controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals (as such terms are defined in the Small Business Act)) for the purposes of carrying out this section. The agency shall include in this section a plan for how the agency will contact small businesses and gather their input on existing agency rules.

“(d) Each agency shall annually submit a report regarding the results of its review pursuant to such plan to the Congress, the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration, and, in the case of agencies other than independent regulatory agencies (as defined in section 3502(5) of title 44) to the Administrator of the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs of the Office of Management and Budget. Such report shall include the identification of any rule with respect to which the head of the agency made a determination described in paragraph (5) or (6) of subsection (e) and a detailed explanation of the reasons for such determination.

“(e) In reviewing a rule pursuant to subsections (a) through (d), the agency shall amend or rescind the rule to minimize any adverse significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities or disproportionate economic impact on a specific class of small entities, or maximize any beneficial significant economic impact of the rule on a substantial number of small entities to the greatest extent possible, consistent with the stated objectives of applicable statutes. In amending or rescinding the rule, the agency shall consider the following factors:

“(1) The continued need for the rule.

“(2) The nature of complaints received by the agency from small entities concerning the rule.

“(3) Comments by the Regulatory Enforcement Ombudsman and the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration.

“(4) The complexity of the rule.

“(5) The extent to which the rule overlaps, duplicates, or conflicts with other Federal rules and, unless the head of the agency determines it to be infeasible, State, territorial, and local rules.

“(6) The contribution of the rule to the cumulative economic impact of all Federal rules on the class of small entities affected by the rule, unless the head of the agency determines that such calculations cannot be made and reports that determination in the annual report required under subsection (d).

“(7) The length of time since the rule has been evaluated or the degree to which technology, economic conditions, or other factors have changed in the area affected by the rule.

“(f) The agency shall publish in the Federal Register and on its website a list of rules to be reviewed pursuant to such plan. The agency shall include in the publication a solicitation of public comments on any further inclusions or exclusions of rules from the list, and shall respond to such comments. Such publication shall include a brief description of the rule, the reason why the agency determined that it has a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities (without regard to whether it had prepared a final regulatory flexibility analysis for the rule), and request comments from the public, the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration, and the Regulatory Enforcement Ombudsman concerning the enforcement of the rule.”

SEC. 12. AGENCY PREPARATION OF GUIDES.

Section 212(a)(5) the Small Business Regulatory Enforcement Fairness Act of 1996 (5 U.S.C. 601 note) is amended to read as follows:

“(5) AGENCY PREPARATION OF GUIDES.—The agency shall, in its sole discretion, taking into account the subject matter of the rule and the language of relevant statutes, ensure that the guide is written using sufficiently plain language likely to be understood by affected small entities. Agencies may prepare separate guides covering groups or classes of similarly affected small entities and may cooperate with associations of small entities to distribute such guides. In developing guides, agencies shall solicit input from affected small entities or associations of affected small entities. An agency may prepare guides and apply this section with respect to a rule or a group of related rules.”.

SEC. 13. GAO REPORT.

Not later than 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Comptroller General of the United States shall complete and publish a study that examines whether the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration has the capacity and resources to carry out the duties of the Chief Counsel under this Act and the amendments made by this Act.

II. PURPOSE OF THE BILL AND SUMMARY

The purpose of H.R. 2542, the “Regulatory Flexibility Improvements Act of 2013,” is to amend the Regulatory Flexibility Act (RFA) by eliminating interpretive lacunae that agencies have used to avoid compliance with the Act. The RFA was enacted in 1980 to ensure that federal agencies take into account the disparate impact that regulations have on small businesses and other small entities. Agencies regularly flouted the requirements of the RFA forcing Congress to take action in 1996 with the enactment of the Small Business Regulatory Enforcement Fairness Act (SBREFA). SBREFA made some significant changes to the RFA with the expectation that it would improve agency compliance. Studies by the United States Government Accountability Office (GAO), reports from the Chief Counsel for Advocacy,¹ and Congressional hearings held by the Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on Small Business demonstrates that agencies are still reluctant to comply with the analytical requirements of the RFA. Further action is evidently needed to force agency compliance.

The bill defines and expands which economic effects are to be examined by agencies, imposes greater detail in performing the analyses, clarifies language concerning applicability of the RFA to the Internal Revenue Service (IRS), subjects all agencies, including the IRS, to the procedures in § 609 on the SBREFA panel process, eliminates barriers to judicial review of RFA compliance for agencies that have a statutory exhaustion requirement after a final rule is published before the rule can be challenged in court, mandates that the Chief Counsel promulgate RFA compliance regulations applicable to all federal agencies, and transfers the limited function on determining size standards of small businesses for purposes other than the Small Business Act and the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 to the Chief Counsel for Advocacy.

III. NEED FOR LEGISLATION

During the 1970s, Congress enacted numerous regulatory statutes. By the end of that decade, businesses, especially small ones, were groaning under the weight of federal regulation. Regulatory requirements were stifling innovation, limiting small business growth, and contributing to the general malaise experienced during the latter half of that decade. The Federal Register, the compendium of federal regulatory actions, had grown from a non-weighty publication for the obscuranta and arcana of the federal government to a 42,000 page blueprint for regulating many of the aspects of modern American life. Small businesses found this crush of federal dictates particularly problematic because those businesses had greater difficulty in complying with regulations than their larger competitors.

In a series of hearings during the late 1970s, Congress began focusing on the ever-growing burden federal regulation imposed upon small businesses. Small businesses reiterated two major themes: (1) they were under-represented in federal regulatory proceedings; and (2) federal agency efforts to impose a “one-size-fits-all” body of regulation imposed disproportionate burdens on small businesses.²

These findings were supported and reinforced during the 1980 White House Conference on Small Business. Congress reacted with the passage of the RFA. That Act constitutes an additional component of a significantly broader mechanism to control agency decisionmaking—the Administrative Procedure Act (APA). The APA prevents an agency from taking actions which are “arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with the law.” 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(A). This standard presumes that an agency will undertake rational rulemaking to: (1) ascertain the problem to be solved through regulation; (2) develop potential solutions; (3) seek public comment on proposed solutions and alternatives not considered by the agency; and (4) craft a final rule that addresses all relevant criteria. Since the vast majority of entities (businesses, not-for-profit organizations, and governmental jurisdictions) regulated by the federal government are small, a rational rule should be one that achieves the objectives of the agency without unduly burdening small entities. The RFA, by focusing the agency's analysis on the economic effects on small entities, will help the agency promulgate rational rules.

From the time of enactment until 1996, compliance with the RFA was at best sporadic. Agencies faced little threat from non-compliance since judicial review of regulatory flexibility analyses was very limited, see Thompson v. Clark, 741 F.2d 401, 405 (D.C. Cir. 1984), and an agency's certification decision could not be challenged in court. See Colorado State Banking Bd. v. RTC, 926 F.2d 931, 948 (10th Cir. 1991); Lehigh Valley Farmers v. Block, 640 F. Supp. 1497, 1520 (E.D. Pa. 1986), aff'd on other grounds, 829 F.2d 409 (3d Cir. 1987) (district court determination on RFA not raised on appeal). Without the ability of court orders, agencies only had to comply when it would benefit their rulemaking or could be cajoled by the Chief Counsel for Advocacy or the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs (OIRA). Both the Committee on Small Business and the Committee on the Judiciary held hearings at which witnesses confirmed the systemic failure by many agencies to comply with the RFA.

Congress responded to this collective disregard by federal agencies with the enactment of SBREFA. The primary change authorized direct judicial review of agency compliance with the RFA, including challenges to agency certifications. SBREFA also mandated that Internal Revenue Service (IRS or Service) interpretative regulations that impose a "collection of information requirement"³ be subject to the strictures of the RFA.⁴ The legislation also recognized that, by the time a proposed rule is published for notice and comment, the agency has substantial intellectual capital invested in the scope of the proposed rule and is unlikely to change the core of its proposal during the notice and comment period.⁵ Therefore, SBREFA requires the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) and the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) to obtain input from representatives of small entities prior to the publication of any proposed rule that would have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities, i.e., any proposed rule for which an initial regulatory flexibility analysis would be prepared.

The changes wrought by SBREFA had some effect on agency compliance. Lawsuits were filed against agencies, although not to the extent feared by critics of judicial review.⁶ Due to the litigation, agencies have come to realize that certifications need to be supported by sound economic analysis or face successful challenges to ³The term "collection of information" is a term of art used in the Paperwork Reduction Act. See 44 U.S.C. §§ 3502(3).

⁵In fact some would argue that the notice and comment period was not a critical component of rational rulemaking but the keystone of "rationale rulemaking" in which the agency uses the public comment process to find further support for the foregone conclusion of its proposed regulation.

⁶Since the changes to the RFA went into effect in late June of 1996 through 2006, a Lexis search reveals somewhere around 110 reported cases involving the RFA. By contrast, during the first ten years after the enactment of the National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA), there were 770 reported cases involving that statute. Neither count accurately reflects the true number of cases filed because reported cases may involve appeals and there may be multiple reported cases involving the same litigation. In other instances, cases that were filed during the respective time periods may not have been resolved. Finally, this only represents reported cases and not those that were filed but settled or were disposed of without a reported decision. Nevertheless, the magnitude of litigation under the RFA was significantly less than under NEPA.

compliance with the RFA. Input by small entities has generated ideas that improved EPA regulations.⁷ Despite these ameliorative effects of SBREFA, much still needs to be done to ensure that agencies comply with the RFA.

Despite SBREFA and litigation, agencies continued to ignore the law. President Bush recognized the importance of the RFA and sought to impose greater compliance by the agencies. In a March 19, 2002 speech, President Bush stated:

Every agency is required to analyze the impact of new regulations on small businesses before issuing them. That is an important law. The problem is it is often being ignored. The law is on the books; the regulators do not care that the law is on the books. From this day forward they will care that the law is on the books. We want to enforce the law.

Subsequent to that speech, the President issued Executive Order (E.O.) 13,272, 67 Fed. Reg. 53,462 (Aug. 16, 2002). The order required agencies to adopt standards for complying with the RFA, make those standards known to the public, and give the Office of Advocacy the opportunity to comment on proposed rules that will have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities prior to publication in the Federal Register. While that Executive Order represents a step in the direction of ensuring the pellucidity of agency procedures to comply with the RFA, it does not close the loopholes that currently exist in the Act or prevent agencies from adopting crabbed interpretations of the RFA that enable the agencies to elide the analytical responsibilities imposed by Congress more than 30 years ago.

President Obama also recognized the importance of the RFA. In a memorandum to the Executive Branch on January 18, 2011, the President noted that the RFA “establishes a deep national commitment to achieving statutory goals without imposing unnecessary burdens on the public.”⁸ The President went on to direct agencies to “give serious consideration to whether and how it is appropriate ... to reduce regulatory burdens on small businesses, through increased flexibility.”⁹ In the memorandum, the President requested (but could not mandate) independent agencies to comply with its terms.¹⁰

Coetaneous with the release of the memorandum on the RFA, President Obama issued E.O. 13,563.¹¹ While the putative purpose of the Order was to clarify the regulatory analytical requirements set forth in E.O. 12,866,¹² § 6 of E.O. 13,563 required agencies to prepare plans for periodic review of regulations, including all extant regulations.¹³ Of course, there already is an existing requirement for periodic review of regulations, § 610 of the RFA.

¹⁰ Since the Supreme Court decision in Humphrey's Executor v. United States, 295 U.S. 602 (1935), independent collegial body agencies, such as the Federal Communications Commission or Nuclear Regulatory Commission, are not subject to control by the White House or subject to presidential executive orders.

Two presidents, in succession, ordered federal agencies to follow the RFA, a law that has been in existence for over 30 years. Every President from Ronald Reagan to Barack Obama has mandated a comprehensive review of existing agency regulations despite the fact that the RFA has required such reviews since its enactment in 1980. Given the fact that presidents must reiterate what is already in the law to agencies over which they have plenary authority starkly demonstrates the need for revision to the RFA. Furthermore, presidential reminders, through memoranda or executive orders, may be ignored with impunity by independent regulatory agencies since presidents are unable to exert regulatory authority over such agencies.

The conclusion that the RFA must be amended despite efforts of five presidents is buttressed by the findings of the GAO. GAO has done numerous studies on agency compliance with various aspects of the RFA and SBREFA.¹⁴ According to GAO, the most significant stumbling block to improved compliance is the lack of definitions for “significant economic impact” and “substantial number of small entities.” GAO also notes that this threshold determination of whether a rule will have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities is critical to compliance with other requirements in the RFA, including periodic review of rules under § 610 and the receipt of small entity input prior to the publication of proposed rules by EPA and OSHA.¹⁵

Testimony at hearings held by the Committee on Small Business during the 106th, 107th, 108th, 109th, 110th, 112th and 113th Congresses further supports the need for change. Hearings before the Committee found that considerable confusion still reigns on when agencies need to conduct regulatory flexibility analyses. Witnesses testified that agencies still finds ways to avoid compliance with the RFA, even after the enactment of SBREFA and various presidential directives to comply. Finally, the testimony was consentient in finding that agencies continue to impose unnecessary burdens on small businesses as a result of their failure to comply with the RFA.

Nor have the courts been the anodyne that the authors of SBREFA contemplated. Courts have not given agency compliance with the RFA the same searching scrutiny that they have given to compliance with the National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA) even though the authors of SBREFA expected judicial review to have the same impact on agency decisionmaking that court decisions had on agency compliance with NEPA. See Associated Fisheries of Maine v. Daley, 127 F.3d 104, 114 (1st Cir. 1997).

¹² Exec. Order No. 12,866, 58 Fed. Reg. 51,735 (Oct. 4, 1993), requires federal agencies to perform a cost-benefit analysis for any regulation that will have an impact of more than $100 million on the economy.

¹³ Exec. Order No. 13,563, § 6, 75 Fed. Reg. at 3,822.

Neither the actions of successive presidents, nor the courts, nor congressional oversight have tempered the broad discretion that agencies have in implementing the RFA. This broad discretion enables them to avoid compliance with the RFA's underlying analytical requirements. In order to constrain this discretion and ensure proper consideration is given to the impact that regulatory actions will have on small entities, particularly small businesses, it is necessary to make further amendments to the RFA as set forth in H.R. 2542 which are set forth in the next section of this report.

IV. HEARINGS

H.R. 2542 is, with one significant exception, identical to the bill that passed the House by a vote of 263 to 159. The one addition is the inclusion of H.R. 585 which was reported out of the Committee by a vote of 13 to 8. As a result, the findings of the Committee in the previous Congress for H.R. 527 and H.R. 585 that address the matters set forth in H.R. 2542 are incorporated herein by reference.¹⁶ The findings of the previous Congress were confirmed anew in a hearing by the Subcommittee on Investigations, Oversight and Regulations entitled "Regulating the Regulators Reducing Burdens on Small Business" on March 14, 2013.

V. COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION

The Committee on Small Business met in open session, with a quorum being present, on September 18, 2013 and ordered H.R. 2542 reported, as amended, to the House by a voice vote at 3:22 p.m. During the markup, 19 amendments were offered. Seven amendments were adopted and 12 were rejected. Disposition of the amendments is addressed below.

Amendment Number One filed by Mr. Huelskamp (R-KS) requires the agencies to provide to small entities, upon their request, panel reports and materials and information provided to the Chief Counsel for Advocacy within 10 business days of the request. The amendment was adopted by voice vote at 2:06 p.m.

Amendment Number Two filed by Ms. Meng (D-NY) and Mr. Barber (D-AZ) would allow an agency to avoid compliance with the RFA, as amended by H.R. 2542, by certifying that compliance will delay implementation of a rule and increase the likelihood that children will be harmed. The amendment was not agreed to on a recorded vote of 11 yeas and 12 noes at 3:07 p.m.

Amendment Number Three filed by Ms. Meng (D-NY) would require that initial and final regulatory flexibility analyses include a description and estimate of the benefits of the proposed rule to small entities. The amendment was not agreed to on a recorded vote of 10 yeas and 13 noes at 3:11 p.m.

¹⁶H.R. Rep. No. 112-89, pt. 2, at 13-14 (2011); H.R. Rep. No. 112-288, at 2 (2011), respectively.

Amendment Number Four filed by Ms. Meng (D-NY) would require each agency to estimate the benefits of the proposed rule and if they exceed the regulation's costs then the agency does not have to convene a Small Business Advocacy Review panel. The amendment was not agreed to by a voice vote at 2:16 p.m.

Amendment Number Five filed by Mr. Barber (D-AZ) requires that an agency conduct outreach to and meaningfully include women, veteran and socially and economically disadvantaged small businesses in their plan to gather input on existing agency rules. The amendment was agreed to by voice vote at 2:18 p.m.

Amendment Number Six filed by Mr. Barber (D-AZ) requires that an assessment of the economic impact of the proposed rule on small entities in a panel report includes an assessment of the proposed rule's impact on startup costs for small entities. The amendment was agreed to by voice vote at 2:20 p.m.

Amendment Number Seven by Ms. Hahn (D-CA) would require that a panel include at least one small entity or their representative that shall benefit from or whose health or safety would be protected by the proposed rule. The amendment was not agreed to by voice vote at 2:23 p.m.

Amendment Number Eight by Ms. Chu (D-CA) would allow an agency to elect not to comply with the RFA, as amended by H.R. 2542, by certifying that compliance with the terms of H.R. 2542 would significantly inhibit the ability of the agency to carry out its statutory duties. The amendment was not agreed to by voice vote at 2:25 p.m.

Amendment Number Nine by Ms. Chu (D-CA) would require the Office of the Chief Counsel for Advocacy to convene a small business panel on potential regulations that may be promulgated to implement a trade agreement when Congress approves a trade agreement. The amendment was not agreed to on a recorded vote of 9 yeas and 14 noes at 3:13 p.m.

Amendment Number 10 by Mr. Tipton (R-CO) allows small entities to provide input on the list of rules an agency plans to review by requiring agencies to solicit public comment on the list of rules when it is published in the Federal Register and on the agency's website. The amendment was agreed to by voice vote at 2:35 p.m.

Amendment Number 11 by Mr. Schrader (D-OR) would strike section 10 of H.R. 2542 which provides authority to the Small Business Administration Office of Advocacy to determine size standards for purposes other than the Small Business Act or the Small Business Investment Act of 1958. The amendment was not agreed to on a recorded vote of 11 yeas and 13 noes at 3:15 p.m.

Amendment Number 12 by Ms. Clarke (D-NY) would allow an agency not to comply with the RFA, as amended by H.R. 2542, with regard to a rule related to terrorism or disaster preparedness or response. The amendment was not agreed to on a recorded vote of 11 yeas and 13 noes at 3:17 p.m.

Amendment Number 13 by Ms. Clarke (D-NY) requires a GAO study no later than 90 days after the enactment of H.R. 2542 that examines whether the Office of the Chief Counsel for Advocacy has the capacity and resources to carry out its duties under H.R. 2542. The amendment was agreed to by voice vote at 2:47 p.m.

Amendment Number 14 by Ms. Clarke (D-NY) would strike section 2(b) of H.R. 2542 which defines economic impact as including both direct economic effects and indirect economic effects that are reasonably foreseeable and result from the rule. The amendment was not agreed to by voice vote at 2:50 p.m.

Amendment Number 15 by Mr. Murphy (D-FL) and Mr. Barber (D-AZ) exempts rules that protect the rights of and benefits for veterans from the definition of “rule” in H.R. 2542. The amendment was agreed to by voice vote at 2:53 p.m.

Amendment Number 16 by Mr. Murphy (D-FL) would allow the Chief Counsel for Advocacy to take on approval of small business size standards only if and when the Chief Counsel certifies that he or she has the funding and personnel to take on this additional duty. The amendment was not agreed to by voice vote at 2:56 p.m.

Amendment Number 17 by Mr. Schweikert (R-AZ) clarifies that indirect economic effects include compliance costs and effects on revenue. The amendment was agreed to by voice vote at 2:58 p.m.

Amendment Number 18 by Mr. Payne (D-NJ) would have made the effective date of H.R. 2542 contingent on a certification from the Chief Counsel for Advocacy that H.R. 2542 will not prevent any agency from taking appropriate and timely action. The amendment was not agreed to on a recorded vote of 9 yeas and 15 nays at 3:20 p.m.

Amendment Number 19 by Ms. Velázquez (D-NY) would have required the Chief Counsel for Advocacy to establish a compliance schedule setting forth a schedule by which agencies must comply with section 6 of H.R. 2542 based on the agency’s budgetary resources. The amendment was not agreed to on a recorded vote of 11 yeas to 13 nays at 3:22 p.m.

VII. SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF H.R. 2542

Section 1. Short title

Designates the bill as the “Regulatory Flexibility Improvements Act of 2013.”

Section 2. Clarification and expansion of rules covered by the RFASubsection (a)—Definition of “Rule”

The RFA currently defines a rule as one that is issued pursuant to the notice and comment provisions of § 553(b) of the APA. This definition is unnecessarily restrictive for no apparent reason. Fundamentally, a rule is any issuance from an agency that does not emanate from an adjudication. Appalachian Power Co. v. EPA, 208 F.3d 1015, 1021 n.13 (D.C. Cir. 2000), quoting Batterton v. Marshall, 648 F.2d 694, 700 (D.C. Cir. 1980). The definition of a rule should be consistent, to the extent practicable, with the definitions set forth in the APA. That will permit courts, for purposes of interpreting the RFA, to adopt the interpretations they have developed under the APA. See White v. Mercury Marine, 129 F.3d 1428, 1434 (11th Cir. 1997); Greenwood Trust Co. v. Massachusetts, 971 F.2d 818, 827 (1st Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 506 U.S. 1052 (1993); Doe v. DiGenova, 779 F.2d 74, 82 (D.C. Cir. 1985) (legislative use of same term in different sections should be given the same meaning and interpretation). Therefore, § 2(a) of H.R. 2542 eliminates the distinction between § 551(4) of the APA and § 601(2) of the RFA.

Section 2(a) of the bill does make one necessary distinction between rules as defined under the APA and the RFA. The APA definition of a rule includes any rule of particular applicability relating to “rates, wages, corporate or financial structures, prices, facilities, appliances, services, or allowances therefor or to valuations, costs or accounting, or practices relating to such rates, wages, structures, prices, appliances, services, or allowances.” 5 U.S.C. § 551(4). The RFA does not apply to any rule that falls within any of the aforementioned categories. Id. at § 601(2). Agencies should not be delayed in approving the financial structure or the like of a specific entity as such rule change clearly could not affect a significant number of small entities. In contradistinction, the rules for how agencies determine rates, wages, or financial structures may have a dramatic impact on small entities.¹⁷ As a result, the appropriate compromise is to define a rule that will cover rates, wages, etc. only if the rule can be applied to more than one entity. For example, the definition of a rule under the Committee’s solution would include the Federal Communications Commission’s (FCC) regulations for calculating the rates charged by incumbent local exchange carriers for unbundled network elements. A rule would not include the application of those standards for determining the unbundled network element rates for a particular incumbent local exchange carrier. To the extent that the determination of the rates are made in a rulemaking, this definition ensures that the agency cannot use as an excuse for delay the need to comply with the RFA. Furthermore, the amendatory language answers in the affirmative the question of whether the RFA covers rules of general applicability concerning the calculation of rates, wages, etc. Finally, any rule that pertains to the protection of the rights and benefits for veterans is exempted from the definition of rule.

Subsection (b)—Inclusion of Indirect Effects

The RFA requires preparation of a regulatory flexibility analysis if the agency determines that the rule will have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities. The original authors of the RFA did not define the term “economic impact” following the trend in the National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA) in which the term “significant effect on the environment” was left open to interpretation. The scope of the economic impacts that should be considered for compliance with the RFA has been the subject of much discussion and confusion even during the debates on passage. The genesis of the confusion stems from comments made by Senator John Culver (D-IA) (one of the original authors of the RFA). In the section-by-section analysis of the RFA, Senator Culver suggested that agencies should assess both indirect and direct effects of the proposed regulation. 126 Cong. Rec. 21,458–59 (1980).

The issue of indirect effects reappeared when an electric cooperative, Mid-Tex, challenged the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission’s (Commission) determination to permit the inclusion of construction-work-in-progress expenses (CWIP) in the rate base for generating utilities. The inclusion of CWIP forced the Commission to raise the rates for wholesale power purchased by electric cooperatives such as Mid-Tex. The Commission certified that the proposed rule would not have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities because the rule only affected large entities—the generators of electric power. The electric cooperatives, in their challenge to the regulation, alleged that the Commission should have performed a regulatory flexibility analysis on the impact that the decision would have on the purchasers of the power. The D.C. Circuit disagreed with the cooperatives’ interpretation of the RFA’s legislative history and held that Congressional intent with respect to the analysis of indirect effects was ambiguous. The court determined, although it did not have to,¹⁸ that the use of indirect effects by Senator Culver referred to the indirect effects on the entities subject to the regulation not the pass-through indirect effects on society in general. Mid-Tex Elec. Coop. v. FERC, 773 F.2d 327, 342–43 (D.C. Cir. 1985). This conclusion has been reaffirmed on a number of occasions by the D.C. Circuit, the only circuit that has considered the issue.¹⁹

By limiting analysis to entities directly regulated, the D.C. Circuit’s interpretation of the RFA enables federal agencies to avoid ¹⁸Since the decision to certify a rule was not a justiciable claim under the original version of the RFA, the court did not have to decide the issue.

¹⁹*American Trucking Ass’n v. EPA*, 175 F.3d 1027, 1044–45 (D.C. Cir. 1999), rev’d on other grounds, 531 U.S. 457 (2001); Motor & Equip. Mfrs. Ass’n v. Nichols, 142 F.3d 449, 466 (D.C. Cir. 1998); United Distr. Cos. v. FERC, 88 F.3d 1105, 1170 (D.C. Cir. 1996). Other courts also have adopted the D.C. Circuit’s interpretation. White Eagle Coop. Ass’n v. Conner, 553 F.3d 467, 479–81 (7th Cir. 2009) (producers indirectly regulated under milk marketing so not able to bring claim under RFA).

assessing impacts on small entities for some very significant rulemakings. Some examples will elucidate this problem.

The EPA is charged with establishing national ambient air quality standards under the Clean Air Act. Once established, the Clean Air Act then grants to the states the authority to develop plans to meet those standards.²⁰ Ambient air quality standards can impose significant economic harm on businesses that may have to reduce their activities in order to comply with the state implementation plan and meet the ambient air quality standards. EPA does not comply with the RFA when it develops the standards or during the approval of the state implementation plans.

The EPA argues that the RFA does not apply because the ambient air quality standards and state implementation plans only regulate states which are not small entities under the RFA.²¹ Despite this legal legerdemain, a revised ambient air quality standard can have a profound impact on the economy and one that is totally foreseeable. The EPA identified significant economic consequences when it revised its ambient air quality standards for nitrogen oxide and particulate matter in the late 1990s. That regulation underwent substantial economic review, including the development of a cost-benefit analysis pursuant to E.O. 12,866. As a result, EPA was required to identify the foreseeable costs of imposing stricter ambient air quality standards on the nation, including small entities, even though the exact scope on specific small entities might vary depending on the state implementation plan. If most of the entities are small that must readjust their behavior to reduce pollution and they cannot comply, the rule is irrational because EPA will not meet its goal of cleaner air. Therefore, an analysis of the indirect effects of the ambient air quality standards is a critical element in the development of the APA-mandated rational rule.

Section 303(d) of the Clean Water Act, 33 U.S.C. § 1313(d), requires states to develop lists of impaired waters, i.e., those waters for which effluent limitations on point sources (such as factories and publicly-owned treatment facilities) do not meet the water quality standards applicable to such body of water. The states are then required to establish total maximum daily load (TMDL) for each impaired body to bring into compliance with the applicable water quality standard. On July 13, 2000, EPA promulgated new regulations to implement the TMDL program. 65 Fed. Reg. 43,585. The EPA certified the final rule because it found that the “rule established requirements applicable only to EPA, states, territories, and Indian tribes. Thus, EPA is not required to prepare a regulatory flexibility analysis.”²² Id. at 43,654. EPA reached this conclusion even though it found that the changes in the TMDL program would result in an annual effect on the economy of more than $100 million. In its E.O. 12,866 analysis, EPA estimated the cost on various industries for complying with updated TMDLs developed by the states. The development and availability of this data under the Executive Order belies any notion that EPA's rules only affected states. As with the ambient air quality standards, the economic consequences were large but foreseeable even though the exact impact on specific entities was not available. Therefore, EPA could and should have developed a regulatory flexibility analysis that assessed the impact on small entities.

If EPA was the only agency where the issue of direct and indirect effects occurred, it would deserve a legislative solution given the impact that EPA regulations have on small entities.²³ However, EPA is not the only agency that has avoided RFA compliance due to the indirect effects of the regulations they promulgate. For example, the Department of Agriculture never complied with the RFA when it promulgated revised regulations for amending forest management plans even though those rules would have significant impact on how the national forests would be managed and would affect thousands of small businesses and rural local governments. The IRS proposed to modify the reporting of non-resident alien interest income which could threaten the availability of capital for small businesses. The Immigration and Naturalization Service proposed reducing the time limit for extensions of visas to foreign visitors which, although not directly regulating any small businesses, could have a significant adverse impact on small businesses that rely on residents of cold climates wintering in places such as Florida or Arizona.

To the extent that these rules are significant under E.O. 12,866, the indirect effects would be analyzed in the development of a cost-benefit analysis. However, the impacts would not be assessed for cost-effectiveness under the RFA—a gap that makes no logical sense and undermines the ability of agencies to craft rational rules as mandated by the APA.

Given the adverse consequences for small entities of indirect effects, it is imperative that agencies consider the foreseeable indirect effects of their regulatory actions on small entities. The Committee does not find that objections raised by the courts and federal agencies—that indirect economic effects cannot be measured with any accuracy—valid. The RFA, as already noted, was modeled on NEPA, in effect forcing agencies to perform an economic impact statement. The Committee believes that the parallels between NEPA and the RFA should include the scope of the effects examined.

According to the regulations promulgated by the Council of Environmental Quality (CEQ),²⁴ the term “effects” means:

(a) Direct effects, which are caused by the action and occur at the same time and place.

(b) Indirect effects, which are caused by the action and are later in time or farther removed in distance, but are still reasonably foreseeable. Indirect effects may include growth inducing effects and other effects related to induced changes in the pattern of land use, population density or growth rate, and related effects on air and water and other natural systems, including ecosystems.

40 C.F.R. § 1508.8. The CEQ regulations go on to state that the term “effects” includes economic effects whether direct, indirect, or cumulative. Id. Agencies have had to comply with these regulations for nearly a quarter of century. If federal agencies are capable of developing estimates of indirect effects of major federal actions for purposes of NEPA, the agencies should be capable of developing the same estimates for compliance with the RFA. This conclusion is buttressed by the fact that major federal actions, for purposes of NEPA, include rulemakings. Id. at § 1508.18; see also Cellular Phone Taskforce v. FCC, 205 F.3d 82, 94 (D.C. Cir. 2000), cert. denied, 531 U.S. 1070 (2001). Thus, federal agencies already are estimating the indirect effects, including economic impacts,²⁵ of some of their regulations in order to comply with NEPA. Given that requirement, the Committee is of the opinion that extending the NEPA requirement to the RFA would not constitute a hardship that federal agencies contend it would be to estimate indirect economic impacts.²⁶

Section 2(b) adopts a definition of “economic effect” that parallels the definition of “effects” utilized by CEQ in its NEPA regulations. The definitions of “direct” and “indirect” (especially as it relates to foreseeability of economic consequences) effects have the same meaning as that developed by CEQ and the courts for interpreting the requirements of NEPA. Furthermore, the definition clearly states that both compliance costs and effects on revenue are indirect economic effects.

Subsection (c) Rule with Beneficial Effects

A regulatory flexibility analysis must be prepared whenever an agency finds that a proposed or final rule will have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities. The statute does not limit the economic impacts to only adverse consequences although 604 requires a final regulatory flexibility analysis to include a discussion of an agency’s efforts to minimize the significant economic impacts of the final rule but requires no discussion of an agency’s efforts to maximize beneficial impacts. This limitation on the analysis also falls within the parallelism to NEPA which only requires agencies to examine alternatives that will mitigate adverse environmental consequences.²⁷ Thus, agencies have interpreted this requirement as obviating the need to perform a regulatory flexibility analysis when the impact of a rule will be significant but beneficial.

²⁵ CEQ regulations define effects of major federal actions to include economic and social impacts. 40 C.F.R. 1508.8.

²⁷ Even though NEPA refers only to mitigation efforts of adverse environmental consequences, beneficial impacts on the environment from various alternatives of the major federal action are discussed in an environmental impact statement. This especially is true when an agency prepares an environmental impact statement for regulatory changes that have the consequence of lowering the amount of pollutants that can be released into the environment. Furthermore, CEQ regulations contemplate that a cost-benefit analysis might be relevant to the decisionmaking process. § 40 C.F.R. 1502.23.

This interpretation is incorrect, but it is easy to comprehend how agencies reached the conclusion based on 604's failure to require a discussion of efforts made to maximize beneficial effects. Despite the absence of such a mandate, such an analysis would be useful because it forces the agency to examine whether it has selected an alternative that maximizes the benefits to small entities. If everything is ceteris paribus, an agency should select an alternative that maximizes any beneficial economic effect on small entities²⁸ because small entities (except in very unusual circumstances) will represent the vast majority of entities subject to a particular regulation.²⁹

Section 2(c) eliminates this confusion by requiring that agencies consider the impact of regulations even if they have a beneficial effect. Under this subsection, a regulatory flexibility analysis will be performed whenever the economic impacts of the proposed or final rule is significant without regard to whether the impacts are positive or negative. This amendment will require agencies to assess alternatives that either mitigate negative economic impacts or enhance positive economic effects. Finally, this subsection should be interpreted to prevent agencies from certifying proposed or final rules when the impacts are significant but beneficial.

Subsection (d)—Rules Affecting Tribal Organizations

Under the current definitions in the RFA, small governmental jurisdictions are those with populations of less than 50,000. The definition typically includes governmental bodies whose power is delegated by the state such as municipalities, water districts, etc. Given the intent of the original legislation to focus on the impact of regulations on entities that are creatures of state governments, it is unclear whether the term "governmental jurisdiction" includes tribal organizations. They are sovereign entities that have a special relationship with the federal government. Oklahoma Tax Comm'n v Citizen Band Potawatomi Indian Tribe, 498 U.S. 505, 509 (1991). The federal government regularly imposes various and often significant regulatory requirements on tribal organizations from those related to the operation of tribal organizations to environmental controls. Despite the imposition of diverse regulatory requirements on tribal organizations, federal agencies fail to perform regulatory flexibility analyses on regulations affecting tribal organizations. The failure to comply with the RFA is particularly troubling because tribal organizations, like many small governments, do not have the infrastructure or resources to interpret and comply with federal regulatory requirements.

Given the adverse consequences on tribal organizations from the failure to comply with the RFA, section 2(d) adds tribal organizations to the list of small governmental entities that fall within the ambit of the RFA. Federal agencies would have to perform a regulatory flexibility analysis on any proposed or final rule if it had significant economic effects on a substantial number of small tribal organizations, i.e., one with a population of less than 50,000. The term tribal organization has the same meaning as that used in 4(l) of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act.

²⁸This conclusion is supported by classical welfare economic theory which teaches that given the selection of a particular policy choice, the one selected should have the greatest ratio of benefits to costs. Such a selection constitutes the most efficient resource allocation.

²⁹Under definitions utilized by the Small Business Administration, small businesses represent more than 95% of the businesses in nearly all of the industrial classifications established by the North American Industrial Classification System. Similarly, there are far more governmental jurisdictions with populations under 50,000 than those with more than 50,000.

Subsection (e)—Inclusion of Land Management Plans

The long-standing position of the Office of the Chief Counsel for Advocacy has been that land management plans developed by the United States Forest Service (Forest Service) and the Bureau of Land Management (BLM) are rules that are subject to analysis under the RFA.³⁰ GAO also reached the same conclusion.³¹ Nevertheless, the Forest Service and BLM maintain that their resource management plans are not rules.³² Given the potential consequences on small entities (both businesses that rely on the resources of the public lands and the communities that border those lands), the Forest Service and BLM should assess the impact of these plans on small entities under the RFA.³³

Section 2(e) of the bill eliminates any questions by requiring the Forest Service and BLM to comply with the RFA when they are developing changes to resource management plans. Compliance is limited to the development of plans and revisions or amendments made thereto but only to the extent that the revisions or amendments require preparation of an environmental impact statement. This limitation is appropriate because minor changes to resource management plans that are not considered major federal actions and are unlikely to impose a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities. In contradistinction, preparation of environmental impact statements demonstrate that the proposed changes to the management plan will be significant. Since BLM and the Forest Service already will have to collect economic data to prepare an adequate environmental impact statement, analysis under the RFA will not pose any undue burdens on the agencies. Finally, this limitation ensures that BLM and the Forest Service

³² The Forest Service gains some sustenance from the Supreme Court's decision in Ohio Forestry Ass'n. In that case, the Court held that a challenge to a forest management plan's logging schedule was not ripe because the logging set forth in the plan was subject to further review and revision, including a site specific analysis. The Court contrasted that with the immediacy and impact of a final rule. 523 U.S. at 737. Given the fact that the Federal Land Management Policy Act uses language very similar to that requiring forest management plans, courts would likely use the Supreme Court's decision in Ohio Forestry Ass'n to reach a similar conclusion about BLM's land management plans. See text accompanying discussion of subsection 2(a), supra. Even though the legal consequences may not satisfy the ripeness requirement under Article III of the Constitution, forest management plans do guide the agency's management of the forests and thus will have economic and policy impacts that need to be weighed, including those on small businesses and small governmental jurisdictions.

³³ Both agencies typically develop environmental impact statements when making major modifications or developing new land management plans. As already noted, CEQ regulations, 40 C.F.R. § 1508.8 requires agencies to consider economic effects (both direct and indirect) in their environmental impact statements. As a result, no rational argument exists for concluding that analysis under the RFA would delay the development of a new plan or the adoption of a major modification to such plan.

will conserve their analytical resources to focus on those plan changes that would have the greatest significance to small entities.

Subsection (f)—Inclusion of Certain Interpretative Rules of the IRS

The RFA only applies to those regulations that are required to be published pursuant to notice and comment rulemaking by either 553 of the APA or some other statute. Section 553 of the APA exempts interpretative rules from the notice and comment requirements. The IRS issues numerous regulations but styles them as interpretative. Prior to the enactment of the SBREFA, the IRS determined that it was not required to comply with the RFA because their regulations were interpretative and therefore need not be issued pursuant to notice and comment rulemaking.³⁴

Congress attempted to rectify the situation with the enactment of SBREFA by requiring IRS compliance with the RFA for any interpretative rule issued that imposes a collection of information requirement on small entities. The IRS has interpreted this amendment by limiting its application, not to any regulation that imposes a collection of information (a term taken directly from the Paperwork Reduction Act), but only on those regulations that require taxpayers to complete a new, never-used form. At a hearing of the Committee on Small Business on May 1, 2003, then Assistant Secretary for Tax Policy, the Honorable Pamela F. Olson, testified that the Department of Treasury and the IRS do not consider that they impose any collection of information requirements; rather collection of information requirements, as well as tax burdens, are imposed by Congress rather than the agencies.³⁵ This has been a long-standing position of the Treasury Department and the IRS.

³⁴The fact that the IRS voluntarily seeks comment on proposed rules does not create a mandate that the agency is required to issue the regulations after notice and comment. Cf. Chrysler Corp. v. Brown, 441 U.S. 281, 306–10 (1979) (noting that agency going beyond requirements in statute does not create justiciable right in court).

³⁵This position is contradicted by the Service's litigation position that its regulations should be given deference that is accorded only to those rules for which the agency intended to have the force and effect of law, i.e., thereby actually making law. E.g., Landmark Legal Foundation v. IRS, 267 F.3d 1132 (D.C. Cir. 2001); Fior D'Italia v. United States, 242 F.3d 844 (9th Cir. 2001); Callaway v. Commissioner, 231 F.3d 106 (2d Cir. 2000); Snowa v. Commissioner, 123 F.3d 190 (4th Cir. 1997).

Commentators have noted that the Internal Revenue Code is replete with straightforward delegations requiring the IRS to promulgate regulations. J. COVERDALE, Court Review of Tax regulations and revenue rulings in the Chevron Era, 64 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 35 (1995). For example, § 385 of the Code provides: "[t]he Secretary is authorized to prescribe such regulations as may be necessary . . . to determine whether an interest in a corporation is to be treated . . . as stock or indebtedness. . . ." In response to a question from then-Chairman Donald A. Manzullo (R-IL), Assistant Secretary Olson stated that any regulations implementing § 385 were interpretative. However, no one would doubt that if a corporation did not follow the regulations promulgated pursuant to that section, the Service could find the taxpayer to be in violation of the law. Similarly, if the taxpayer failed to comply with the regulations adopted by the Secretary concerning the time for depositing taxes set forth in regulations adopted by the IRS pursuant to 6302, the taxpayer would find itself facing significant penalties. Nevertheless, the IRS maintains that the regulations are interpretative despite the fact that the Service is exercising its discretion when taxes are to be deposited or what constitutes indebtedness.

The Service's intransigence and aberrant interpretation of the APA is further placed in stark relief by comparison to similar statutes. For example, Title V, Subtitle A of Gramm-Leach-Bliley provides: "[t]he Federal Trade Commission [FTC], . . . may prescribe regulations clarifying or describing the types of institutions which shall be treated as financial institutions for purposes of this subchapter." 15 U.S.C. § 6827(4)(E). This permissive authority enables the FTC to include other institutions, including credit reporting agencies, as financial institutions, even though they were not enumerated in the definitions of financial institutions. This authority is no different than the supplementation that the IRS in §§ 385 and 6302 found to be interpretative. Yet, the FTC argued and the court agreed that the regulations classifying credit reporting agencies as financial institutions were valid legislative regulations with the force and effect of law subject to Chevron deference. Individual Reference Servs. Group v. FTC, 145 F. Supp. 2d 6 (D.D.C. 2001). There is no rational distinction between the permissive authority in Gramm-Leach-Bliley

The Office of the Chief Counsel for Advocacy has criticized that jejune interpretation. The authors of H.R. 2542 also consider the IRS interpretation to violate the letter and the prophylactic intent of SBREFA.³⁶ The RFA's definition of the term "collection of information" is identical to that used in the Paperwork Reduction Act. There is no evidence that Congress intended the term "collection of information" to mean something different in the RFA than it does in the Paperwork Reduction Act. Cf. Atlantic Cleaners & Dyers v. United States, 286 U.S. 427, 433 (1932); United States v. Blasini-Lluberas, 169 F.3d 57, 63 (1st Cir. 1999) (same term in different statutes have same meaning unless legislative history demonstrates to the contrary). The evidence of identical treatment of the term in the two statutes is evidenced by Congress incorporating into the RFA the exact definition of the term "collection of information" as it is used in the Paperwork Reduction Act. In addition, it would be illogical to assume that Congress did not intend the term "collection of information" from the two statutes to be coextensive because Congress was making a legislative modification designed to force IRS compliance with the RFA. Clearly, Congress, given the testimony in hearings on RFA compliance and reports of the Chief Counsel for Advocacy concerning IRS compliance, would not adopt a definition of the term that authorizes the current crabbed interpretation of the term "collection of information." Nor do the authors accept the principle that the IRS does not itself impose collection of information requirements not otherwise specified in statute.

Of all the agencies that have protested and contested the application of the RFA to rulemakings, the IRS remains the most recalcitrant. The Service believes that its obligations to collect revenue supersede any mandates from Congress that the IRS considers interference with its statutory mission. The Constitution vested legislative power with Congress not the IRS and the Service has no authority to ignore those dictates. Hearings before the Committee on Small Business, comments from the Office of the Chief Counsel for Advocacy, and directives from Presidents Bush and Obama have not changed the intransigent position of the IRS or Treasury Department on RFA compliance. H.R. 2542 represents the congressional response to the obstinacy of the IRS.

Section 2(f) eliminates the IRS interpretation that it need only comply with the RFA if it is imposing a new form. The subsection also recognizes that the IRS believes that Congress is imposing the collection of information requirements. Therefore, the bill takes the approach that requires compliance with the RFA whenever the Service intends to codify a regulation in the Code of Federal Regulations and the regulation or statute that the regulation is interpreting imposes a collection of information requirement.

The modifications to § 603 should not be viewed by the IRS as limiting its economic analysis simply to the cost associated with the

and the permissive authority in the Internal Revenue Code. Thus, many of the regulations implementing the Code are legislative in nature and burdens are imposed by the Service.

Nevertheless, nothing in H.R. 2542 attempts to make a priori determinations of what regulations should be considered legislative in nature. Nor do the authors of the bill attempt to resolve the murky administrative law problem of distinguishing between legislative and interpretative rules.

³⁶OIRA is charged with interpreting and implementing the Paperwork Reduction Act. 44 U.S.C. § 3504. Thus, the IRS is not the implementing agency. As such, its interpretation of that Act is not entitled to any deference. Professional Reactor Operator Soc'y v. NRC, 939 F.2d 1047, 1051 (D.C. Cir. 1991).

“collection of information.” Rather, the “collection of information” simply acts as a trigger for the broader assessment of economic effects of the proposed and final rule. This would include any increases or decreases in payment of taxes resulting from the rule.

The authors of the bill reject out of hand the IRS’ contention that the true economic effect of its regulations stem from the Internal Revenue Code. There are a number of instances in which the IRS argues that its regulations are substantive and deserve Chevron deference. E.g., Bankers Life and Cas. Co. v. United States, 142 F.3d 973, 978 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 525 U.S. 961 (1998) (explaining cases in which IRS requested Chevron deference). Since the Supreme Court accords Chevron deference only to agency pronouncements which are intended to have the force and effect of law in order to fill statutory gaps or resolve legislative ambiguities, United States v. Mead Corp., 533 U.S. 218, 230–31 (2001), the IRS cannot be heard to argue that its regulations are unable to create or eliminate the payment of taxes. To give a more recent example, the IRS decided to propose a regulation that would eliminate an exemption the agency itself created for special mobile machinery. 67 Fed. Reg. 38,913 (June 6, 2002). Eliminating the exemption would add hundreds of millions of dollars in tax burdens to companies not currently paying certain excise taxes. For the IRS to argue that the economic effects of its regulations stem solely from the strictures of Congressional mandates is disingenuous.

Nor is it likely that compliance with the RFA will slow the issuance of IRS regulations. Taking the example of the special mobile machinery exemption, the IRS easily could have determined the total revenue that the Highway Trust Fund would receive from the elimination of the exemption based on the aggregate data it obtains when businesses file for excise tax rebates (this data also would provide an accurate estimate of the revenue impact of excise tax payments for vehicles currently exempt). The IRS should not be exempt from this basic requirement of rulemaking (understanding the scope of the problem and the effect of the proposed solution). Obtaining similar aggregate data to comply with the RFA should not slow the development of regulations.³⁷ In fact, without this data, the IRS could not make sensible estimates of the amount of revenue gain or loss that would occur with a particular regulatory change. The argument that compliance with the RFA would slow regulatory development is a red herring and certainly is an inadequate rationale for supporting the current IRS practice with respect to RFA compliance.

This conclusion is bolstered by the testimony of Frank Swain at the Committee’s May 1, 2003 hearing on RFA compliance by the IRS in the 108th Congress. At that hearing, Mr. Swain revealed that the Service had in its possession a study it requested from the Federal Highway Administration on the economic impact of removing the special mobile machinery regulation. The study by the Federal Highway Administration was dated 1999 and the IRS did not promulgate a proposed rule on eliminating the exemption until the summer of 2002, nearly three years later. Thus, the assertion that the completion of regulatory analyses will slow the development of regulations is, at best, specious.

³⁷To the extent that the IRS needs to promulgate a regulation in an emergency situation, it can find good cause to forgo rulemaking and issue its regulation without analysis under the RFA. This exemption should be used sparingly by the Service because compliance with statutory mandates or the agency’s own inaction fails to meet the “good cause” exemption in the APA. Buschmann v. Schweiker, 676 F.2d 352, 357 (9th Cir. 1982); Nat’l Ass’n of Farmworkers Organizations v. Marshall, 628 F.2d 604, 622 (D.C.Cir. 1980). In fact, the Ninth Circuit has determined that notice and comment rulemaking can be conducted in situations in which an agency is required to issue rules on a weekly basis something the IRS does not have to do. Riverbend Farms, Inc. v. Madigan, 958 F.2d 1479, 1486–87 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 506 U.S. 999 (1992).

The RFA adopted the definitions in the Paperwork Reduction Act for the terms “collection of information” and “recordkeeping requirement.” Despite the identical nature of the definitions in the two pieces of legislation, some agencies, particularly the IRS, might argue in court the use of the terms in the two statutes have different meanings. See Atlantic Cleaners & Dyers v. United States, 286 U.S. 427, 433 (1932) (noting that Congress may use similar terms in different statutes to have different meanings).

The authors of SBREFA, in 1996, always intended that the terms utilized in the Paperwork Reduction Act to have the same meaning as that in the RFA. To eliminate potential confusion, § 2(f)(2–3) repeals the definitions in § 601(7–8) and simply cross-references to the relevant portions of the Paperwork Reduction Act as set forth in title 44 of the United States Code. This eliminates any possibility that a court would apply a different interpretation to the RFA’s use of the terms “collection of information” and “recordkeeping requirement.” Although used for slightly different purposes,³⁸ the palliative nature of both statutes, with respect to burdens on regulated entities, clearly justifies the application of the in pari passu canon of statutory construction³⁹ to the terms “collection of information” and “recordkeeping requirement.”

Subsection (g)—Definition of Small Organization

As already noted, the RFA covers small entities other than small businesses. The RFA defines a small organization as “any not-for-profit enterprise which is independently owned and operated and is not dominant in its field. . . .” 5 U.S.C. § 601(4). That definition fundamentally makes no sense because there is no rational way to determine a not-for-profit’s independence or economic dominance. The definition raises a number of practical questions. For example, on a local level, a rural electric cooperative might be considered dominant in the sense that it is the only provider of electric service in a rural area. However, on a national basis,⁴⁰ is the rural electric cooperative dominant? Should the electric cooperative be compared with other electric cooperatives or with all other businesses in the electric utility industry? While some industries may have for-profit analogs, other small entities, such as charitable institutions or trade associations that can be adversely affected by federal regulations, do not. Furthermore, affiliation standards that the SBA uses in its size determinations may not be applicable in the not-for-profit sector, such as whether a trade association should be affiliated, for size determination purposes, with its members or whether a charitable institution is independently owned and operated by its donors.

³⁸In the Paperwork Reduction Act, the terms trigger a mandatory review of the paperwork burdens imposed by the government on citizens. In the RFA, it triggers a mandatory review of the economic burdens imposed by the IRS on small entities. Both statutes, therefore, are designed to force agencies to examine ways to reduce burdens on the regulated community.

³⁹See Ruckelshaus v. Sierra Club, 463 U.S. 680, 691 (1983) (applying in pari passu construction of various federal attorneys fee shifting statutes).

In a different context, the courts have grappled with the notion of independence of not-for-profit entities. The Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA) permits certain small entities to recover their legal fees should they prevail in litigation against the federal government. EAJA classifies eligible parties as one that does not have a net worth in excess of $7,000,000 or more than 500 employees. Under EAJA, the question then becomes whether an entity requesting attorneys fees from the government actually fits within its zone of protection. Courts, in trying to answer this question, have wrestled with the concept of affiliation by assessing whether the small entity is affiliated with larger enterprises in a manner that defeats the purpose of the EAJA—ensuring that only small entities that do not have the financial wherewithal to sue the federal government receive attorneys fees if they prevail in litigation.

One interpretation, adopted by the Sixth Circuit, would require complete aggregation of members net worth and employees to determine EAJA eligibility.⁴¹ The second interpretation, proffered by the federal government on a frequent basis, is that a trade association should be ineligible if any of its members exceed the net worth and employee standards.⁴² This interpretation of EAJA has been rejected by the D.C., Fifth, and Seventh Circuits.⁴³ These circuits determined that EAJA eligibility should be calculated by looking solely at the organization that brings the litigation, its net worth, and number of employees.

Given the prophylactic nature of both the EAJA and the RFA with respect to small entities, it would make sense to apply the interpretations of the EAJA to the RFA. Thus, one definition of “small organization” would be to adopt the definition of small entity used by the Sixth Circuit. However that approach is incompatible with the purposes of the RFA because the capabilities of a small organization to comply with regulations is not based on the resources of its members but rather on the number of employees and net worth the organization controls.⁴⁴ Since the small organization does not control or have direct access to the net worth of its members, it should be judged on solely on its resources and not those of its members or donors.

Section 2(g) adopts a two-prong approach to the definition of small entity. First, it recognizes that for many not-for-profit organizations there are small for-profit analogs. If there is an existing Small Business Administration size standard for a small business, the agency should use that definition for small organizations. For example, the size standard for electric utilities is one that generates, transmits, or distributes annually 4 million megawatt hours and a small not-for-profit electric cooperative would be one that ⁴² See Comment, Corporate Goliaths in the Costume of David: The Question of Association Aggregation under the Equal Access to Justice Act—Should the Whole be Greater than its Parts? 26 Fla. St. U.L. Rev. 151 (1998) (collecting cases in which federal government argued for aggregation).

⁴⁴ While there is some facial appeal to the concept that a small organization could seek assistance from its members (probably through the payment of higher dues), there is no guarantee that it would be able to do so. And even if it did, depending on the makeup of the organization, that could impose additional burdens on small businesses that might be members of the organization which undercuts the palliative purpose of the RFA.

generates, transmits or distributes annually 4 million megawatt hours. If an organization does not have an equivalent size standard under Small Business Administration regulations, then the size of the entity shall be that under the EAJA—net worth of $7,000,000 and not more than 500 employees. Net worth and number of employees should be calculated by examining the not-for-profit organization without aggregating or affiliating the net worth or employees of any member or donor.

Section 2(g) also provides a definition of small labor organization since they have unique characteristics that do not easily fall into any other category of small organization as used in the RFA or H.R. 2542. Agencies do not examine the impact of their regulations on local chapters of national and international labor unions. As with other small organizations, local chapters may not be able to rely on the resources of their parent organizations for compliance assistance. Therefore, §2(g) deems that a local chapter of a labor union shall be a small organization for purposes of compliance with the RFA without regard to its affiliation with a national or international labor organization. As a result, if the Department of Labor imposes a regulation on the operation of a labor union, the Department will have to consider its impact on these local chapters even if they are considered to be affiliated with a national or international union. However, the agency need not consider the impact of the regulation on individual members of the local labor union since it is the entity (not the members) subject to the regulation.⁴⁵

Finally, §2(g) authorizes an agency to adopt a different definition of small organization after the opportunity for notice and comment to the extent such different definition is appropriate. The subsection also requires consultation with the Office of the Chief Counsel for Advocacy. Essentially, the process for defining small organizations would be identical to that already in the RFA for small businesses under §601(3).

Section 3. Expansion of report of regulatory agenda

Section 602 of the current RFA requires each agency to publish in the Federal Register a regulatory flexibility agenda each April and October. By alerting small entities to potential consequences of upcoming rules, the authors of the legislation expect greater involvement of small entities in the rulemaking process ultimately leading to regulations that achieve agency objectives without unnecessary burdens. These agendas describe which rules an agency expects to issue in the near future that are likely to have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities. The agencies are required to briefly describe the rules; however, in their current form, the regulatory flexibility agendas provide almost no insight into the potential impacts of the rules on small entities. Thus, the regulatory flexibility agendas are of little use to most small entities.

Section 3 expands the information required to be provided in the regulatory flexibility agendas thereby increasing transparency and providing small entities with a better understanding of the potential impacts of a rule an agency expects to propose or promulgate.

⁴⁵ Nor would the agency have to consider the indirect effects on the individual members since those individual members are not an entity, i.e., small business, small non-profit, or small governmental jurisdiction.

Each agency is required to describe the sector of the North American Industrial Classification System that is primarily affected by the rules. Section 3 also requires the agencies and the Office of Advocacy to publish plan language summaries of the information in the agendas on their websites.

Section 4. Requirements providing for more detailed analyses

Senator Culver, in developing the concept for the RFA, was attempting to mirror the type of in-depth analyses that agencies performed under NEPA when assessing the impact of major federal actions that would have a significant impact on the environment. The language of the two statutes are sufficiently parallel to the point that it makes sense to draw a conclusion that the RFA creates a requirement for an economic impact statement for federal rules that will have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities.

This thesis has been accepted by the courts. In Associated Fisheries of Maine v. Daley, 127 F.3d 104 (1st Cir. 1997), Judge Selya, writing for the court, stated:

We think that a useful parallel can be drawn between RFA §604 and the National Environmental [Policy] Act, which furthers a similar objective by requiring the preparation of an environmental impact statement (EIS). . . . The EIS requirement is meant to inform the agency and the public about potential . . . alternatives prior to a final decision on the fate of a particular project or rule. . . . Recognizing the analogous objectives of the two acts. . . .

Id. at 114. Judge Selya noted that the analogy seemed fair since the EIS requires a detailed statement while the RFA only requires a statement. The rectitude of Judge Selya's reading is confirmed by the D.C. Circuit adoption of the parallelism finding.⁴⁶

NEPA's success in changing agency culture did not occur immediately after enactment because agencies were initially loath to prepare environmental impact statements and upset embedded constituencies that benefitted from various federal projects. Activists who disagreed with the need for a particular project used NEPA to stop the projects from going forward. While the Supreme Court ultimately determined that NEPA is not a substantive statute, see Strycker's Bay Neighborhood Council v. Karlen, 444 U.S. 223, 227 (1980), the litigation losses by the government forced agencies to draft better environmental impact statements. The litigation reinforced the underlying principle of NEPA that "important effects will not be overlooked or underestimated only to be discovered after resources have been committed or the die otherwise cast." Robertson v. Methow Valley Citizens Council, 490 U.S. 332, 349 (1989).

After a number of hearings before various House and Senate Committees, Congress determined that agencies were ignoring their responsibilities under the RFA. The solution recommended by witnesses and ultimately adopted by Congress was judicial review of agency compliance with the RFA. SBREFA was premised on the threat of judicial review creating an atmosphere that would force agencies to comply with the RFA in the same manner and with the same completeness that agencies considered environmental impacts to avoid challenges of their compliance with NEPA. In other words, the authors of SBREFA expected that important economic consequences to small entities would not be overlooked prior to an agency's commitment to a specific regulatory approach. The end result is not analysis for analysis sake, but rather more rational rule-making as dictated by the APA.

The imposition of judicial review has not had the salutary effect that Congress expected. While it has been effective in forcing agencies to perform regulatory flexibility analyses rather than certifications,⁴⁷ the majority of analyses are perfunctory. The agencies comply with the bare minimum specifications without really addressing the important issues—impacts on small entities and alternatives to minimize those impacts. However, this minimalist effort appears to satisfy the standard of demonstrating a reasonable effort to comply. A cursory look at a court's analysis of the adequacy of an environmental impact statement demonstrates the distinction between a statement pursuant to the RFA and detailed statement required by NEPA.

Judicial review of agency compliance with NEPA is designed to ensure that agencies take a “hard look” at environmental consequences. Robertson, 490 U.S. at 350, citing Kleppe v. Sierra Club, 427 U.S. 390, 410 n.21 (1976). In turn, courts carefully scrutinize the environmental impact statement to determine whether the agency has addressed each element of the statement:⁴⁸ the environmental impact of the proposed action; any unavoidable adverse environmental consequences should the proposed action be implemented; alternatives to the proposed action; relationship between short and long-term uses of the environment; and commitment of any irreversible and irretrievable commitments of resources should the proposal be implemented. 42 U.S.C. § 4332(2)(C). Courts do not look at the statement as whole and determine whether the agency made a reasonable effort to address the requirements of NEPA. Instead, the courts examine, in detail, each requirement to determine whether the statement adequately addresses that element. E.g., Colorado Env'tl Coalition v. Dombeck, 185 F.3d 1162, 1171–76 (10th Cir. 1999); City of Carmel-by-the-Sea v. United States DOT, 123 F.3d 1142, 1150–60 (9th Cir. 1997). The close scrutiny accorded to environmental impact statements by the courts then ensures significant consideration of environmental consequences.

There can be little doubt that the reasonableness standard is appropriate for judicial review of regulatory flexibility analyses. However, the absence of the “detailed” statement requirement has led courts to provide only a cursory review of compliance with the requirements of § 604 of the RFA. The limited scope of the review to meet the standard of reasonableness has enabled agencies to avoid taking a hard look at the economic consequences of their proposed and final rules. Carrying the distinction found by Judge Selya in Associated Fisheries of Maine, to its logical conclusion suggests that the difference in the scrutiny between the two statutes rests on the distinction between a “statement” and a “detailed statement.”

⁴⁷ Courts have found violations of the RFA when an agency incorrectly certified a rule rather than preparing a regulatory flexibility analysis. E.g., Harlan Land Co. v. USDA, 186 F. Supp. 2d 1076, 1097 (E.D. Cal. 2001); North Carolina Fisheries Ass'n v. Daley, 16 F. Supp. 2d 647, 652 (E.D. Va. 1997).

Section 4 modifies the requirements for preparing a regulatory flexibility analysis in order to ensure that agencies will give the same “hard look” to economic consequences that agencies already give to environmental effects pursuant to NEPA. Adoption of this stronger standard does not transform the RFA into a decision-forcing statute. Once the agency has taken the “hard look” at the economic consequences of its rulemaking action, application of the rational rulemaking standards inherent in the APA would strongly suggest that the agency take those consequences into account when crafting a final rule. However, nothing in the RFA mandates a particular regulatory outcome and nothing in H.R. 2542 changes that abecedarian tenet of the RFA. The agency is at liberty to determine that other values outweigh the economic burdens imposed on small entities. Cf. Strycker’s Bay Neighborhood Council, Inc. v. Karlen, 444 U.S. 223, 227–28 (1980); Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power Corp. v. NRDC, 435 U.S. 519, 558 (1978) (holding that NEPA does not require agency to select least environmentally damaging alternative).

Subsection (a)—IRFAs

Section 4(a) amends 603 by requiring the initial regulatory flexibility analysis (IRFA) to contain a “detailed statement” rather than a statement. This should lead agencies to prepare IRFAs with the same detail and care that are currently required for draft environmental impact statements.

Currently, an agency, in preparing an IRFA, must provide: (1) the rationale for undertaking the proposed rule; (2) a succinct statement of the objectives and legal basis for the rule; (3) a description and estimate, where practicable, of the number of small entities affected by the proposed rule; (4) a description of the reporting and recordkeeping requirements along with an estimate of the skills needed to comply with such requirements; (5) an identification to the extent practicable of overlapping or duplicative federal rules. 5 U.S.C. § 603(b). In addition to these requirements of subsection (b), the IRFA also must contain alternatives that will minimize adverse or maximize beneficial effects of the proposed rule. Id. at § 603(c).⁴⁹ H.R. 2542 makes a number of changes and additions to these analytical requirements as will be outlined below.

H.R. 2542 strikes the term “succinct” from § 603(b)(2) to avoid possible confusion between an overall requirement of a detailed statement and the use of a “succinct” statement of the objectives of the rule. Federal agencies will not have to create something new for this statement. Rather, they will be able to simply take the summary of the rule that is prepared for publication in the Federal Register and add the legal basis (if not already incorporated in the summary) and republish it in the IRFA.⁵⁰

⁴⁹ Nothing in H.R. 2542 affects the requirements in the IRFA under § 603(c).

Section 603(b)(3) of the RFA currently requires the IRFA contain, when feasible, a description and an estimate of the number of small entities affected by the proposed rule. This requirement provides a substantial loophole for agencies to comply with the RFA. The Office of Advocacy calculates that there are more than 25 million small businesses in the United States based on aggregate data from the IRS. Size standards established by the Small Business Administration demonstrate that more than 95% of the businesses in each industrial classification are small. Thus, most entities subject to any regulation are likely to be small. An agency that fails to provide a relatively accurate estimate of the number of small entities affected by a proposed rule, cannot undertake rational rule-making because the agency has no idea of the scope of the affected universe. The failure to provide an accurate estimate of the number of small entities affected would be akin to a federal agency stating that it has no way to determine the environmental consequences of building a dam on a river and therefore cannot complete an environmental impact statement. Such a rationale would not be accepted by any court and agencies should not be able to shirk their duty to understand the scope of the regulated universe simply because they might have to gather actual data on the number of small entities. As a result, §4(a) strikes the term “where feasible” in its re-draft of § 603(b)(3).⁵¹

The current requirement for completion of an IRFA requires the agency to identify, to the extent practicable, all relevant duplicative, overlapping, and conflicting rules. 5 U.S.C. § 603(b)(5). As with the requirement for estimating the number of small entities, the proviso “to the extent practicable” creates a loophole that allows the agency to prepare an irrational rule. Two classic examples elucidate the problem. The ergonomics standard established by the Department of Labor in 2000 (and subsequently overturned by a joint resolution pursuant to the Congressional Review Act) mandated that businesses develop plans to eliminate musculo-skeletal disorders. One way to perform this task in skilled nursing facilities is to purchase mechanical lifts for patients. However, regulations promulgated by the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) permit a patient to reject being lifted by mechanical device. Nothing in the final ergonomics rule or the final regulatory flexibility analysis (FRFA) addressed this potential conflict because the Department of Labor never identified the CMS rules as creating a problem. Another example involves the requirement for notifying communities of underground storage facilities pursuant to §312/313 of the Emergency Planning and Community Right to Know Act. EPA required gas stations to notify EPA that they had underground storage tanks with gasoline so EPA could provide that information to local communities. However, this information already was being provided to local fire departments under other regulatory regimes. The Office of the Chief Counsel for Advocacy had to intervene before EPA redressed the duplicative reporting requirement. Had EPA actually made the effort to comply with the RFA, it would have identified the duplication and avoided promulgation of an additional reporting burden on small businesses.

⁵¹ An agency might not be able to estimate the number of small entities when the agency is preparing a rule that opens up existing markets to new entrants or creates a new market. In such circumstances, there are no statistics on the number of small entities in that market. In such circumstances, it is probable that the agency, in preparing the proposed rule, has some sense of the number of potential new entrants from discussions with industry. Of course, such estimates will not have the precision that an agency should have when proposing a modification to an existing rule or imposing a new rule on a well-established industry. Nevertheless, an inaccurate estimate (with appropriate caveats concerning the lack of precision) is better than no estimate. Furthermore, the agency should recognize the lack of confidence in the estimate and make a specific request in its notice of proposed rulemaking for data on the number of small entities.

It is difficult to understand how an agency can draft rational rules without knowing how its proposed or final regulatory solution will mesh with other existing federal requirements imposed by itself or other agencies. While the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs in the Office of Management and Budget (OIRA) can play a role in identifying these overlaps and conflicts, the primary role must be the agency drafting the regulation because it is the agency that has the obligation to create a rational rule—not OIRA or the Office of Advocacy. Section 4(a) resolves this problem by striking the “extent practicable” from the existing § 603(b)(5). Thus, an agency, in drafting proposed regulations, will have to identify duplicative, overlapping, and conflicting regulations. Obviously, agencies will need to start an interagency dialog in order to identify duplicative, overlapping, or inconsistent regulatory requirements. This should improve the rationality of agency rulemaking and prevent the tunnel vision (the agency has to promulgate this rule so why concern itself with what other agencies have done) that federal regulators currently wear in implementing the directives of Congress. The new requirement in the IRFA also should assist OIRA in carrying out its regulatory coordination function set forth in E.O. 12,866.

Section 4(a) adds a new requirement for preparation of an IRFA. One of the biggest problems that small entities face is not the imposition of any one particular regulatory requirement; rather it is the accumulation of burdens from many regulatory requirements from all federal agencies that can have a significant effect on the capital available for small businesses to expand their enterprises. Any assessment of the impact of a rule on small entities, particularly small businesses, cannot be even reasonably accurate without understanding how the proposed rule interplays with the already extant burden on the entities subject to the regulation. To be sure, this assessment will be difficult. Section 4(a) adds a new paragraph (6) to § 603(b) that requires an evaluation of the cumulative impact or an explanation why such evaluation is not possible. It is likely that an agency would have to inquire with OIRA, the Office of Advocacy and other federal agencies to compile the cumulative economic impact data. As with other provisions of the RFA, as amended by H.R. 2542, nothing in the cumulative impact evaluation prevents an agency from determining that other factors are more significant than the costs imposed on small entities and continuing with the rulemaking process. Identification will provide the agency, the affected public, and Congress with a better assessment of the implementation of statutory mandates. Furthermore, the identification may help the agency develop alternatives that impose less cumulative impact while still achieving an agency’s regulatory objective.

While the RFA requires identification of impacts on small entities, not all small entities are necessarily equally affected by a proposed rule. For example, many of the marketing orders established by the United States Department of Agriculture (USDA) pursuant to the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act of 1937, 7 U.S.C. § 608c,⁵² will have different effects on producers, handlers (essentially wholesalers), and processors. Even within one class of growers, the regulations implementing marketing orders may have disparate impacts between independent growers and those associated with agricultural cooperatives. This simply represents one example of numerous regulations in which a proposed rule might have very different consequences on different classes of small businesses. In fact, the Office of the Chief Counsel for Advocacy criticized USDA for conflating various impacts of its rules on marketing orders to find that the proposed rule would not have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities even though a class of small businesses would be severely harmed. To rectify this situation and force agencies to better understand the potential consequences of their proposed rules, § 4(a) of H.R. 2542 adds a new paragraph (7) to § 603(b) of the RFA by requiring agencies to describe any disproportionate impact on small businesses⁵³ or a specific class of small businesses.

Subsection (b)—FRFAs

Section 4(b) amends the requirements for completing a FRFA. The changes made by the Committee to § 604 ensure the development of a detailed statement that forces agencies to give a “hard look” at the final rule stage to the economic consequences of the final rule. The bill adds the term “detailed” to the statement requirement where currently only a statement is required.⁵⁴ Use of the detailed statement in the preparation of a FRFA does not mandate any particular outcome in an agency rulemaking. Rather, it simply assures that an agency, the public, Congress, and the courts fully understand the scope and impact of a final rule on small entities. Furthermore, 4(b) requires that the same seven analytical elements required in the IRFA by the amended § 603(b) be incorporated into the FRFA mandated by the amended § 604(b).

The changes made by § 4(b) also comports with the parallelism between the RFA and NEPA as noted by the First and D.C. Circuits. The expectation is that the agencies, after the regulations issued by the Chief Counsel pursuant to § 5 of H.R. 2542, and the courts will interpret in the same manner the term “detailed statement” currently contained in NEPA. The FRFA should evidence the agency’s hard look at the economic consequences of the final rule and provide appropriate grist for the mill of judicial review.

⁵² A detailed discussion of marketing orders and the Regulatory Flexibility Act can be found in Pineles, Marketing Orders and the Administrative Process: Fitting Round Fruit into Square Baskets, 5 SAN JOAQUIN AG. L. REV. 89 (1995).

Current law mandates the agency summarize, in the FRFA, the comments received in response to an IRFA. While it is true that all IRFAs lead to the preparation of a FRFA, not all FRFAs are developed in response to an IRFA. An agency may initially certify a rule pursuant to § 605(b) and then receive sufficient comment that the rule will have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities. The agency then would prepare a FRFA. However, the agency would be under no obligation to summarize the comments that it received in response to the certification in the FRFA. This simply represents an oversight by the authors of the RFA and SBREFA. An adequate FRFA should entail the summarization of comments received in response to a certification at the proposed rule stage. The process of summarization assists the Congress, the courts, and the regulated community in identifying those cost considerations that the agency failed to recognize at the proposed rule stage. The simple step of making an affirmative identification will help agencies perform better cost assessments at the initial stage of rulemaking and avoid unnecessary delays in the development of a final rule. Section 4(b) rectifies this problem by requiring the summarization of comments on a certification made at the proposed rule stage.

Current requirements in the RFA mandate federal agencies to publish the FRFA in the Federal Register or, in lieu thereof, a summary with information specifying where an individual can obtain the full analysis. Since the enactment of SBREFA in 1996, numerous initiatives within the government have utilized the explosive growth of the Internet and Internet-based communication. Many agencies participate in the general website for regulatory matters, www.regulations.gov. Agencies that do not participate in that website (many of the independent agencies, such as the Commodities Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) or the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC)) have their own electronic interfaces for accepting and publishing regulatory material on the web. Continued growth of electronic availability of rulemaking documents and dockets is beneficial for both small entities and federal agencies. Since the RFA has not been amended since the growth of Internet-based rulemaking access, § 4(b) updates the publication requirements for the FRFA by requiring that it be placed on the agency website. Publication on the agency's website and publication of the link to a website in the Federal Register notice of the final rule does not obviate the obligation that currently exists in the RFA to publish the FRFA or summary thereof in the Federal Register along with the final rule.⁵⁵

Subsection (c)—Cross References to Other Analyses

In an effort to avoid duplication, federal agencies can use other analyses to meet the requirements of the RFA but only if that analysis satisfies the requirements of the RFA. For example, a federal agency can use an environmental impact statement to the extent that analysis assesses alternatives which would be less burdensome or more beneficial to small entities. See Associated Fisheries of Maine, 127 F.3d at 115. Utilization of existing analyses is beneficial by reducing the work done by the agencies and the documentation that small entities must review during the rulemaking process. Unfortunately, agencies fail to provide adequate cross-references to these other documents. For example, some agencies will state in their IRFA or FRFA that alternatives were examined to reduce the adverse consequences and a discussion can be found in the statement of basis and purpose. Generic cross-references then force interested small entities to wade through dozens, if not hundreds, of pages in the Federal Register or on an agency website to determine whether the IRFA or FRFA was adequate. The indefiniteness of the cross-references is especially problematic at the proposed rule stage because the inability to quickly identify alternatives will tend to dissuade small entities from filing comments. Section 4(c) resolves this problem by mandating that agencies make sufficiently specific cross-references to other analyses that satisfy the requirements of the IRFA or FRFA. The expectation is that the specificity must be sufficient so that a small entity can turn directly to the part of the cross-referenced analysis that addresses the component of the IRFA or FRFA.

Subsection (d)—Certifications

The RFA authorizes an agency head or delegatee to certify that a proposed rule will not have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities. Certification obviates the need for preparation of an IRFA or FRFA⁵⁶ in the same way that a finding of no significant environmental impact (FONSI) eliminates an agency's preparation of an environmental impact statement.⁵⁷ After the enactment of the RFA in 1980, agencies frequently issued boilerplate certifications that merely reiterated the language of §605(b).⁵⁸ Small entities had no way of ascertaining why these certifications were issued and courts were prohibited from even examining the certification as part of the rulemaking record.⁵⁹

Congress attempted to rectify the problem of boilerplate certifications with the enactment of SBREFA. Since July 1, 1996, agencies are required to provide a factual basis for the certification. This amendment has not improved agency certifications. Many still reiterate the statutory language without further exegesis. Some refer back to other material in the statement of basis and purpose without identifying the cross-referenced material. Still others provide some factual basis for the certification. No agency provides the detail in its certification that can be found in an environmental assessment accompanying a FONSI. Given the fact that the RFA parallels NEPA (as already noted), it is appropriate for agencies to supply in their certifications, the same detail that accompanies an environmental assessment. Furthermore, requiring greater specificity and detail in the certification will force the agency to develop a better assessment of the potential economic effects on small entities before they publish a proposed rule. This should lead to improved agency decisionmaking.

⁵⁶ Preparation of a certification at the proposed rule stage does not foreclose an agency from preparing a FRFA at the final rule stage due to comments filed after the proposed rule was published. The change in the agency position cannot be considered a failure; rather it demonstrates the principle of agency edification by the public inherent in the notice and comment process.

Section 4(d) amends § 605(b) by requiring the preparation of a detailed statement supporting the certification decision. The section also mandates that the agency provide the legal rationale for any certification as well as a factual basis. This requirement is unfortunately necessary because agencies frequently certify proposed and final rules based on the inapplicability of the RFA to the rule-making process in the first instance. For example, agencies often certify a rule in which the agency has forgone notice and comment under the APA. The Committee believes that it is appropriate for an agency to explain to the both the small entity community and any reviewing court these legal conclusions about the basis for its decision.⁶⁰ If the FRFA is to be reviewed under the same standard as a final EIS prepared pursuant to NEPA, then the logical conclusion to the statutes' parallelism is for the certification under the RFA to be reviewed by a court under the same scrutiny that it would apply to a FONSI under NEPA.

Subsection (e)—Quantification Requirement

Section 4(e) modifies the existing requirements in § 607 of the RFA concerning the quantification of effects on small entities. Agencies are required to provide a numerical or descriptive analysis of the effects on small entities. Rational rulemaking requires an agency to understand the scope of the regulated community, the costs currently faced by those entities, and the economic consequences of any regulatory action. Under § 607, agencies can avoid developing sound numerical data and can provide general descriptions, such as the regulation will increase costs to small entities. The absence of objective numerical data makes it more difficult for small entities to assess the significance of any regulatory change. Agencies should make every effort to obtain objective data supporting a regulatory change including the estimated consequences to small entities.⁶¹ Section 4(e) amends § 607 by making quantification of impacts the default in developing an assessment of impacts on small entities.

There may be circumstances in which it is difficult, if not impossible, to provide accurate quantification of a rule's impact on small entities. For example, if a regulation is opening a new market, the agency may not be able to determine the universe of potential market entrants. The agency then should not be forced to develop highly suspect numerical estimates of the impacts.⁶²

⁶⁰Technically, it would be incorrect for the agency to certify a rule for which notice and comment is not required because the RFA trigger is notice and comment. Nevertheless, many agencies, out of an abundance of caution, certify these rules. If they are going to do so, then the agencies should be required to explain what they are doing and why they are doing it.

⁶¹The amendment set forth in § 4(e) is further supported by the enactment in 2000 of the Data Quality Act and that Act's requirement that agencies provide accurate data in all of their functions, including rulemaking. The Data Quality Act requires the Office of Management and Budget to issue guidelines to all agencies ensuring that the soundness of the data they present to the public. 44 U.S.C. § 3516 note.

⁶²The inaccurate estimates would be subject to challenge under the Data Quality Act in any event. If the quantifiable effects are sufficiently suspect simply due to the paucity of available data, it makes no logical sense for the agency to quantify such effects only to have them challenged under the Data Quality Act and adds no benefit to an agency's rulemaking, its analyses under the RFA or to the small entities.

New subsection (2) of § 607 of the RFA authorizes agencies to provide a more general description of the impacts on small entities if quantification is not practicable or reliable. The reliability factor in new subsection (2) should incorporate the standards of data established by each agency pursuant to the Data Quality Act. If an agency determines that it is unable to provide a quantification and still meet the criteria of the Data Quality Act, the agency shall provide a detailed statement explaining why it cannot provide the quantification. Ultimately, the quality and accuracy of the data will be the subject of regulations drafted by the Office of the Chief Counsel for Advocacy.

Section 5. Repeal of waiver authority and additional powers of Chief Counsel

This section repeals the provision in § 608 authorizing the head of an agency to waive completion of a FRFA for up to 180 days if the agency cannot complete the FRFA by the time the rule needs to be published. In lieu of that waiver, H.R. 2542 grants additional powers to the Office of the Chief Counsel for Advocacy.

Repeal of Waiver Authority

The RFA allows an agency to waive the requirements for an IRFA and delay for up to 180 days the preparation of a FRFA. This provision is unnecessary. Notice and comment rulemaking is not required if the agency, for good cause finds it impracticable, unnecessary, or contrary to the public interest. 5 U.S.C. § 553(b)(B). The courts have interpreted this provision as authorizing an agency to forgo notice and comment rulemaking in true emergencies in which delayed promulgation would do real harm.⁶³ An agency that establishes good cause to forgo notice and comment need not comply with the RFA because the analytical requirements are only triggered if the rule must be promulgated pursuant to notice and comment rulemaking. The conditions under which a waiver would issue under § 608 of the RFA also satisfies the impracticable, unnecessary, or contrary to the public interest standard of § 553(b)(B) of the APA. Since agencies would not be required to comply with the RFA under such circumstances no good rationale exist to have such a waiver provision.

Revised § 608—Additional Powers for the Office of the Chief Counsel for Advocacy

In two hearings on the Office of Advocacy, the Committee received testimony suggesting that the Chief Counsel for Advocacy's findings on compliance with the RFA should be accorded some type of deference.⁶⁴ The witnesses were responding to the D.C. Circuit's decision in American Trucking Ass'n v. EPA, 175 F.3d 1027 (D.C. Cir. 1999), rev'd in part and aff'd in part, Whitman v. American Trucking Ass'n, 531 U.S. 457 (2001). In that case, the D.C. Circuit stated: “[t]he SBA, however, neither administers nor has any policymaking role under the RFA; at most its role is advisory. . . . Therefore we do not defer to the SBA’s interpretation of the RFA.” 175 F.3d at 1044, citing Scheduled Airlines Traffic Offices v. Department of Defense, 87 F.3d 1356, 1361 (D.C. Cir. 1996).⁶⁵ Absent some action by Congress, courts are unlikely to grant the Chief Counsel’s interpretations of the RFA any deference. And if the courts do not do so, it also is highly improbable that other federal agencies will do so.

The situation clearly needs to be rectified. Granting the Chief Counsel’s interpretation of the RFA deference substantially will change the balance between the Chief Counsel and the agencies in the development of regulations. Currently, the Office of Advocacy simply must cajole the agencies to make regulatory modifications or otherwise revise their certifications or regulatory flexibility analyses. The Chief Counsel has little power to coerce changes that would be beneficial to small businesses or other small entities. However, an Office of Advocacy accorded deference in interpreting the RFA can represent, in conjunction with its authority to file amicus briefs in court, a substantial power to coerce regulatory modifications. If an agency does not comply properly with the RFA, the threat of the Chief Counsel “intervening” in court and expressing an opinion, which the court will give substantial deference, that the agency did not comply with the RFA could lead to a remand of the regulation. Therefore, the agency is likely to negotiate changes in RFA compliance that might in turn result in subsequent modifications to the rule that would reduce burdens on small entities.

One potential option would be to amend the RFA by mandating that courts and agencies give substantial deference to the views of the Chief Counsel concerning compliance with the RFA. This appears to be the tersest solution to the D.C. Circuit’s dismissal of Advocacy’s comments. However, brevity in this circumstance is unworkable for a variety of reasons. First, the personnel of the Office of the Chief Counsel for Advocacy can change at the behest of the President. Each new Chief Counsel can adopt different interpretations of the RFA. If that is the case, then it is possible that an agency may receive inconsistent interpretations of the RFA; in turn, that makes it more difficult for the agency to develop a consistent methodology for assessing the impact on small entities. Furthermore, the courts have held that the level of deference afforded an agency is dramatically reduced if the agency is constantly changing the interpretation of a statute. Thomas Jefferson University v. Shalala, 512 U.S. 504, 515 (1994). And the constantly shifting sands of Chief Counsel interpretations is not the gravest barrier to achieving deference; the Chief Counsel’s interpretations still must overcome the standards established by the Supreme Court in Chevron USA, Inc. v. NRDC, 467 U.S. 837 (1984) and United States v. Mead Corp., 533 U.S. 218 (2001).

Courts start an analysis of a statute by first determining whether Congress spoke explicitly and clearly on the point in question. If so, Chevron dictates that the courts go no further; interpretations offered by the agency that are inconsistent with a clear mandate from Congress receive no deference and are invalid. 467 U.S. at 842–43. If the agency interpretation is consistent with the clear language of the statute, courts must uphold the agency interpretation. Id. This is often referred to as “Chevron Part One” analysis. The real deference accorded the agency comes pursuant to the so-called “Chevron Part Two” analysis. Under that standard, an agency’s interpretation of an ambiguous statute or statutory lacuna filled by the agency is accorded substantial deference if the interpretation or gap-filling regulation is rational. Id. In essence, as between two equally valid or rational interpretations of an ambiguity in a statute, the agency’s interpretation wins under “Chevron Part Two.”

Not all pronouncements from an agency are eligible for deference under the “Chevron Part Two” test. For the answer to that question, one must look to the Court’s decision in United States v. Mead Corp. According to that case, Chevron deference exists not on some inflexible line, but rather on a continuum depending on the intent of Congress and the agency’s procedures for developing the interpretation. 533 U.S. at 227–31. The keystone for Chevron deference is whether Congress “would expect the agency to be able to speak with the force of law.” Id. at 229. The Court noted that “a very good indicator of delegation meriting Chevron treatment in express congressional authorizations to engage in the process of rulemaking . . . that produces regulations . . . for which deference is claimed.” Id. Since notice and comment rulemaking represents a formal administrative procedure to reach an agency decision, the Court concluded that it would be logical to assume Congress intended the agency pronouncement in such circumstances to have the force and effect of law. Id. at 230. Thus, regulations arising from notice and comment rulemaking would be afforded full Chevron deference.

Given the state of the caselaw and the objectives of empowering the Chief Counsel, the best alternative for ensuring the Chief Counsel’s interpretation of the RFA would be given Chevron deference is to require the Chief Counsel to promulgate government-wide rules which all agencies must follow in complying with the RFA. This is a well-trodden path followed by federal agencies in the implementation of the RFA’s parallel statute—NEPA. After enactment of NEPA, all federal agencies developed their own, often inconsistent approaches, to compliance. In 1977, President Carter issued an executive order mandating the Council of Environmental Quality (CEQ) to “issue regulations to Federal agencies for the implementation of the procedural provisions of the Act [NEPA] (42 U.S.C. 4332(2)).” E.O. 11,991 (May 24, 1977), reprinted in 42 Fed. Reg. 26,967 (May 25, 1977). Even though Congress, in NEPA, did not delegate to CEQ any power to issue regulations,⁶⁶ the regulations developed by it are accorded substantial deference by the courts. Robertson v. Methow Valley Citizens Ass’n, 490 U.S. 332, 356 (1989).

New § 608(a) provides that the Chief Counsel for Advocacy shall promulgate regulations governing agency compliance with the RFA. The Chief Counsel should follow the pattern established by CEQ—draft baseline regulations that all agencies must follow but grant the agencies the authority to supplement those regulations to meet their own needs. These regulations promulgated by the Chief Counsel must be done pursuant to notice and comment rulemaking because it ensures adequate participation of all interested parties and comports with the Supreme Court's determination in United States v. Mead that notice and comment rulemaking assures the agency (in this case the Chief Counsel) will be granted Chevron deference.

The revised § 608 also authorizes federal agencies to supplement the Chief Counsel's rules. However, these supplemental regulations cannot conflict with the regulations promulgated by the Chief Counsel. To ensure the absence of conflict, federal agencies wishing to supplement the rules must consult with the Chief Counsel in an effort to eliminate conflicts but may issue the rules without the approval of the Chief Counsel. H.R. 2542 could have taken the approach that supplemental agency rules could not be adopted unless the Chief Counsel approved them. That path represents bad policy for two reasons. First, one agency should not have the authority to disapprove another agency's regulations; if the delegation of power was improper, Congress should act by passing legislation modifying the delegation of authority. Second, Chief Counsel approval would be an executive branch employee interfering with the operation of independent agencies such as the Federal Communications Commission, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, and the Federal Trade Commission. Even though these agencies must obtain approval of their collection of information requests from OIRA, Congress recognized their independence from the executive branch by granting them the power to override a disapproval by simply majority vote of the commissioners. 44 U.S.C. § 3507(f)(1). It sets a bad precedent to authorize, on an ad hoc basis, an executive branch agency, approving or disapproving the actions of an independent collegial body regulatory commission.⁶⁷

New § 608(b) provides the Chief Counsel with the same power to intervene in individual agency adjudications that the Chief Counsel has to file an amicus brief under § 612 of the RFA. There have been instances in which the Chief Counsel attempted to intervene in adjudications before federal agencies due to the significance of the issues raised by the adjudication but was rebuffed because the administrative law judge determined that the Chief Counsel was not a proper party to the proceeding. This is particularly important because some agencies, such as the Agricultural Marketing Service, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, and the National Labor Relations Board make significant policy determinations in adjudicatory proceedings. The clear grant of a right to intervene will eliminate this problem.

The section also makes clear that the right to intervene as a party in an adjudication does not grant the Chief Counsel the authority to appeal any decision by the administrative law judge either to another body in the agency (such as an appeal to the full Commission) or to federal court. The role of the Chief Counsel in adjudicatory proceedings is vital but limited to advising the decisionmakers of the significance of the issues to small entities rather than as a real party in interest. Given these concerns and the possibility that small entities might request the assistance of the Chief Counsel in an individual adjudication, the better policy is to exclude the Chief Counsel from intervening in adjudications in which the agency is authorized to impose a fine or penalty. It is the expectation that the Chief Counsel will refer to this restriction when a small entity requests intervention in an individual enforcement proceeding to deny that request. In sum, the intervention rights granted in this subsection are not designed to allow the small entity to substitute the Chief Counsel for adequate retention of private counsel.⁶⁸

Amended § 608(c) authorizes the Chief Counsel to file comments on any notice of proposed rulemaking without regard to whether the notice had been issued pursuant to § 553 of the APA. This language ensures the Chief Counsel's role as the primary advocate for small entities in federal agency decisionmaking and not just on agency compliance with the RFA.

Section 6. Procedures for gathering comments

Section 609 of the RFA requires three federal agencies, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA), the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) and the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau (CFPB or Bureau), to consider, prior to publication of a proposed rule in which an IRFA will be prepared, the concerns of small entities. Section 609(b) of the RFA establishes the procedures for obtaining the input of small entities. The procedures require the formation of a panel of federal employees, including a representative from the Office of Advocacy (the organizer of the panel), who then obtain input on the potential economic impacts from selected small entity representatives.⁶⁹ After receiving the input, the panel submits a report to the agency and requires the agency to respond to the panel report in the proposed rule. The agency is at liberty to modify the proposal according to the recommendations of the panel report but is not required to do so.

The Committee on Small Business received testimony in hearings that the panel process needs expansion to other federal agencies and requires technical changes to ensure optimal participation by small entities. The process established in 609(b) makes a valuable contribution to agency understanding of the impacts of its proposals on small entities.⁷⁰ In fact, during a hearing on the H.R. 2345 (a predecessor bill), during the 108th Congress, the Chief Counsel for Advocacy, Tom Sullivan, recommended that the process be expanded to all agencies. The argument of the Chief Counsel (whose employees would have to deal with the SBREFA panels) makes sense and H.R. 2542 adopts the recommendation to expand the SBREFA panel process to all agencies when they are proposing a rule that will have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities or the proposed rule qualifies as a major rule under the Congressional Review Act. The SBREFA procedures will increase the value of the prepublication input to federal agencies and enhance the rationality of the rulemaking process.

⁶⁸ The Chief Counsel has neither the resources nor the expertise to represent private parties in federal administrative enforcement proceedings.

⁷⁰ At a Committee hearing on CFPB's compliance with the RFA, the CFPB Director testified that the Small Business Advocacy Review panels helped the Bureau to shape its proposals, been a collaborative process between small entities and the Bureau, and have proven to be valuable to the CFPB. Know Before You Regulate: The Impact of CFPB Regulations on Small Business, 112th Cong., 2d Sess. (2012) 4 (statement of Director Richard Cordray).

Section 6 modifies the standards for determining which proposed rules will be subject to the panel process. Current law limits the rules to those for which EPA, OSHA and CFPB will prepare an IRFA. This parameter unnecessarily narrows the regulations that should be the subject of a § 609 panel and allows the agencies to make a self-interested determination to avoid the panel process. A more appropriate standard would be any rule for which the covered agencies decide to prepare an IRFA or for any rule that a covered agency or OIRA determines to be a major rule under standards identical to those found in 804 of the Congressional Review Act. Except in the most unusual circumstances (such as a regulation on natural gas pipelines or automobile manufacturers), a major rule will affect a substantial number of small entities and the agency preparing the rule will benefit from small entity input.

The Committee on Small Business has heard informally from the Office of the Chief Counsel for Advocacy that questions remain concerning the kind of material made available by the covered agencies. Section 6 clarifies that the agency provide the Chief Counsel and the employees of that Office all materials prepared or utilized in developing the proposed rule including a copy of the draft rule. The covered agencies also are required to provide information on the impacts, whether positive or negative, on small entities. Agencies should be as forthcoming with material as possible. To the extent that information utilized by the agency is not subject to disclosure as proprietary information under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), appropriate non-disclosure agreements with the Office of Advocacy would be appropriate. The Office of Advocacy is an executive branch agency within the federal government and should be assumed to operate under the same prohibitions against the release of predecisional documents or proprietary information that apply to all federal agencies under FOIA.

Special procedures must be applied with respect to rules drafted by the IRS. If certain small entities receive the actual draft of a proposed tax rule, those entities may be able to take advantage of that information in tax planning or through business transactions. Clearly, this is a legitimate concern and H.R. 2542 does not require the IRS provide the exact language of any draft proposed rule. For example, the IRS would state it is planning to modify the calculation of certain depreciable assets but would not be required to provide the exact date for the regulation to take effect. However, the IRS would be expected to provide sufficient information to enable the small entities to make sensible comments to the panel.

Provision of draft regulations by independent regulatory agencies (those collegial body organizations set forth in 44 U.S.C. § 3502(5)) also raises potential problems. Under their organic statutes, these collegial bodies only can take action if a majority of the members of the collegial body approve the action. The Government in Sunshine Act prohibits the members from conducting business except in an open meeting. 5 U.S.C. § 552b(b). If an agency set forth in

44 U.S.C. § 3502(5) was to submit a draft regulation to the Office of Advocacy, prior to a meeting, that could be taken as akin to the conduct of business not in an open meeting. The importance of the Government in Sunshine Act should not be underestimated. Therefore, the agencies are not required to submit the draft proposed rule to the Office of Advocacy. Under the revised § 609, collegial bodies only should submit sufficient information so that small entities understand the scope of the proposed regulation in order to make their input to the panel worthwhile.⁷¹

The Committee also recognizes that E.O. 12,866 by its own terms does not cover these independent regulatory agencies. Since the Supreme Court's decision in Humphrey's Executor v. United States, 295 U.S. 602 (1935), these agencies are not considered part of the executive branch and their regulatory activities are not considered subject to oversight by OIRA. To avoid any entanglement between the executive branch and these independent regulatory agencies, the panel reports are prepared by an employee of the agency and an employee of the Office of Advocacy. OIRA employees only will be a part of the panel process for those agencies not set forth in 44 U.S.C. § 3502(5).

Disputes have arisen between the Office of Advocacy and agencies over the definition of small entity representative. The conflict stems from an inconsistency in the drafting of § 609(b). The Office of Advocacy is to identify individuals representative of small entities for obtaining advice but the panel is only required to collect advice and recommendations from individual small entity representatives identified by the agency after consultation with the Office of Advocacy. For example, EPA limits its universe of small entity representatives only to actual businesses affected; in contrast, the Office of Advocacy is willing to hear from trade association executives and lawyers who represent small entities.

The language in § 609 is not a model of clarity and requires amendment to ameliorate disputes between the Office of Advocacy and other federal agencies that serve on the panel. New subsection 609(c) that accords to the Office of Advocacy the sole responsibility of selecting the small entity representatives. The Office of Advocacy has the greatest contact with small entities and is least likely to select biased representatives.⁷² The Office of Advocacy should use the discretion granted to it in § 609 in a balanced manner by finding small entity representatives that can provide diverse views on a particular proposed regulation. The amendment to § 609 also ends the dispute over the universe of potential small entity representative by authorizing the Office of Advocacy to select either small entities or their representatives for providing advice to the panel. Under this language, the Office of Advocacy may select individual small entities, lawyers or consultants who represent small entities, or officials from trade associations whose members include small entities.

Section 609 currently requires the panel to receive recommendations and draft a report that becomes part of the rulemaking record. The panel should receive advice and recommendations from small entities. The panel should discuss these issues but it is inappropriate for a panel to write a report conveying the concerns of small entities. H.R. 2542's rewrite of § 609 adds a new subsection (d) that mandates the Chief Counsel for Advocacy to draft the report. In drafting the report, the Chief Counsel must consult with the other panel members to ensure that the report accurately reflects the views of small entities. This change ensures that the Office of Advocacy, being an independent voice for small entities, will provide a more robust representation of small entity views than a report from a panel that includes personnel from the agency that crafted the rule and the agency that might review the rule—OIRA. Furthermore, the small entities are more likely to participate if they know that the Chief Counsel is charged with conveying their views to the rulemaking record.

⁷¹In many instances rules from these collegial bodies, such as the FCC, tend not to have very specific regulatory language. More often than not, the proposed rules read more akin to advanced notices of proposed rulemaking without even tentative conclusions.

⁷²Federal agencies promulgating regulations would have a bias to select small entity representatives, to the extent possible that would support the regulatory position of the agency.

The panels currently convened under § 609 are not subject to the strictures of the Federal Advisory Committee Act. The amendments to that section made by H.R. 2542 should not be construed as requiring the General Services Administration to comply with the Federal Advisory Committee Act.

New § 609(d) also modifies the contents of the report. Currently, the report simply provides a litany of issues raised by small entity representatives as filtered by the panel. While this information is useful, reasoned decisionmaking, including appropriate consideration of all statutory factors (one of which is the impact on small entities), requires a report of greater detail. A requirement has been added that the report contain an assessment of the proposed rule on small entities and a discussion of alternatives that will maximize beneficial or minimize adverse economic consequences. The assessment also is required to discuss the proposed rule's impact on the cost that small entities pay for energy and on start-up costs for small entities. By requiring this information at a preproposal stage, the agency will have the opportunity to modify the regulation or amend its IRFA should it wish to do so. Furthermore, the inclusion of this report early in the rulemaking record will provide small entities with a base of ideas upon which to suggest other alternatives during the rulemaking process. The inclusion of alternatives also can assist the agency in demonstrating to the courts that it approached the rulemaking process with an open mind. PLMRS Narrowband Corp. v. FCC, 182 F.3d 995, 1002 (D.C. Cir. 1999); United Steelworkers of American v. Marshall, 647 F.2d 1189, 1208 (D.C. Cir. 1980). The report need not be an exhaustive peroration of alternatives but should be sufficient to provide both the agency and the regulated community with some ideas on what alternatives are available. However, the report should include alternatives, to the extent possible, that are not being considered by the agency in the preparation of its IRFA.

There may be exceptional circumstances where an agency finds it impracticable, unnecessary or contrary to the public interest to receive input at the preproposal stage. New § 609(f) creates a procedure by which the agency can seek a waiver of the panel process. Waivers only should be granted in the same exceptional circumstances similar to those that would permit an agency to forgo notice and comment rulemaking pursuant to § 553(b)(B) of the APA. For example, EPA may need to deal with an imminent public health problem and has sufficient time to issue a rule for a brief notice and comment period but does not have the lead time to conduct a panel process. That would be the type of circumstance in which the Chief Counsel might consider a waiver of the panel process.

Finally, new § 609(g) enhances transparency in the rulemaking process by providing small businesses with access to panel reports and materials and information used to develop a proposed rule. It allows a small entity or a representative of a small entity to request that an agency provide a copy of a panel report and all materials prepared or utilized in developing the proposed rule that were provided by the agency to the Chief Counsel for Advocacy. The agency is required to provide the report, materials and information to the requesting small entity or its representative within 10 business days. Any proprietary information utilized by the agency that is not subject to disclosure under FOIA shall not be subject to disclosure under this section.

Section 7. Periodic review of rules

Section 610 of the RFA mandates that agencies periodically review their rules that have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities. GAO has done a number of studies of agency compliance with § 610 and found compliance sorely lacking.⁷³ GAO concludes that the problem relates back to the threshold determination of whether the regulation will have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities. While GAO's conclusion is correct, the problems with § 610 compliance are far more pervasive and endemic. Unfortunately, § 610 was not a paragon of clear statutory drafting; the language is easily interpreted in a manner by which agencies can avoid compliance. Nevertheless, periodic review of regulations is an excellent idea because it forces agencies to examine their regulatory structures given changes in the marketplace. Rather than trying to correct unclear drafting, H.R. 2542 completely revises the section through the development of procedures that ensure agencies will periodically review those regulations which have a significant economic impact on small entities.

When § 610 was first enacted, agencies were required to develop plans for periodic review. These plans are now more than 30 years old. An investigation by the Committee on Small Business in 1997 and 1998 found that many agencies cannot find their plans; given the passage of time, it is less likely that those plans can be unearthed. Rather than having agencies dig through archives for 30 year old plans, revised § 610 requires the development of new plans for periodic review within 180 days after the enactment. The plan must detail how an agency will conduct outreach to and gather input from small businesses on existing rules in order to periodically review its regulations pursuant to § 610. In addition to publication of the plan in the Federal Register, agencies are required to place these plans on their websites.⁷⁴

⁷³ See note 15, supra.

⁷⁴ This should not be a substantial burden on agencies since all executive branch agencies had to come up with a plan to review all existing reviews pursuant to President Obama's revisions to E.O. 12,866.

The trigger for periodic review in the revision to § 610 will be whether the agency head determines that the regulation has a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities. The language is written in the present tense meaning that the regulation is subject to review if at the time of review of the regulation, the rule has a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities. The provision grants the agency appropriate flexibility in determining when to conduct periodic review based on current circumstances not events that happened a number of years before the review. In ensuring that the review occurs based on current conditions, language in the amended § 610 makes it explicit that the decision for review is independent of whether the agency developed a FRFA at the time of the rule's original promulgation. Despite the flexibility provided by § 610, there is an expectation that the full compliance with the periodic review provision will be based on the regulations promulgated by the Chief Counsel pursuant to the authority of amended § 608.

Although the revised § 610 tracks the scope of the review currently in the RFA, there were a number of modifications designed to make the review more thorough. The review now must include comments from the Regulatory Enforcement Ombudsman and the Office of Advocacy to ensure that the agency receives the most current information on the affect of a rule including how agencies may be enforcing (or abusing) the regulation. The revision also requires the agency to consider the rule's contribution to the cumulative impact of federal regulatory burden on small businesses. However, given the complexity of such calculation, § 610(e)(6) allows the head of the agency to explain why such calculation cannot be made and include such statements in the report that the agency files pursuant to new § 610(d). These amendments to the scope of review also comport with those made to the FRFA under § 4 of H.R. 2542.

Periodic review commences from the date of enactment of the Act. The plan must provide for review of all regulations in force at the time of enactment within ten years of the date of enactment. A regulation in effect on enactment may not have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities and should not be reviewed. However, five years after enactment the regulation may have that impact; if the agency had not previously reviewed the regulation or made a determination that the regulation did not have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities after publication of the plan of review, the head of the agency would determine at the time the regulation came up for review whether it should be reviewed. In short, the determination of "significance" and "substantial" should be made as close to the review date as possible and based on the most current information available. Regulations promulgated after enactment of the legislation must be reviewed within ten years after the publication of the final rule in the Federal Register. Agencies are authorized to extend the review process for no more than 2 years. Agencies have the resources to complete the review within 12 years. Unlike the current statute, the agency head delaying the review must notify the Chief Counsel for Advocacy because of the Chief Counsel's responsibility to monitor agency compliance with the RFA.

A new mandate in § 610 requires each agency to report annually on the results of its periodic reviews. The current version of § 610 can be interpreted as allowing a review to take place without it being memorialized. Submission of a report will enable the Office of Advocacy, House and Senate Committees, and OIRA to take appropriate action to ensure compliance or question the determinations on specific rules. To protect the independence of collegial body commissions (such as the SEC or CFTC), the agencies identified in § 3502(5) of Title 44, United States Code need not submit reports to OIRA.

Revised subsection 610(f) requires the agency to place on its website a list of rules to be reviewed annually as well as a brief description of the rule, the agency's preliminary determination on why the regulation has a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities, and a request for comments from the public, the Chief Counsel and the Regulatory Enforcement Ombudsman. The agency is also required to solicit and respond to comments from the public on any rules that should have been included on or excluded from the list or rules to be reviewed. Utilization of the Internet⁷⁵ should maximize input from affected small entities. The Committee also requires publication in the Federal Register and the agency can combine the publication of the list of rules for review in conjunction with its semi-annual agenda in the Federal Register⁷⁶ prior to the start of the next calendar year.

Nothing in the changes made by H.R. 2542 modifies the ability of adversely affected entities to challenge agency compliance with the periodic review requirements. Given the procedures established in the revised § 610 and the regulations to be promulgated by the Chief Counsel pursuant to amended § 608, the determination of whether a particular regulation should be reviewed is subject to judicial challenge and is not committed to agency discretion under Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821 (1985) and its progeny.

Section 8. Judicial review of compliance with the RFA

Section 8(a) modifies the current requirement that judicial review of the RFA is limited to "final agency action." Instead, judicial review will be available when the agency publishes the final rule. Section 8(b) modifies the jurisdiction of courts by inserting the parenthetical "or which would have such jurisdiction if publication of the final rule constituted final agency action."

The changes are made due to concerns that certain procedural requirements for challenging agency regulations could dramatically delay small entity challenges to the agency compliance with the RFA. For example, under the Medicare program, challenges to CMS regulations must first run the gauntlet of the Department of Health and Human Services administrative law judges and departmental appeals boards. See Shalala v. Illinois Council on Long Term Care, Inc., 529 U.S. 1 (2000).⁷⁷ Similarly, regulations issued ⁷⁵It would be up to the Office of the Chief Counsel for Advocacy to determine how www.regulations.gov fits into the Internet publication requirement of § 610.

⁷⁶Publication of the list in the April or May Federal Register's semi-annual agenda would not provide sufficient notice to small entities on the rules for which the agency has already commenced review since the beginning of the calendar year.

⁷⁷There are cases in which the courts, after much judicial prestidigitation, found that exhaustion was not required. E.g., Furlong v. Shalala, 238 F.3d 227 (2d Cir. 2001); American Lithotripsy Soc'y v. Thompson, 215 F. Supp. 2d 23 (D.D.C. 2002). However, these court cases are not sufficiently definitive with respect to the availability of review outside the Departmental to implement marketing orders under the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act must go through a statutory exhaustion process before an administrative law judge and then the Chief Judicial Officer. United States v. Ruzicka, 329 U.S. 287 (1946). These formal statutory exhaustion requirements, often the vestiges of legislation enacted prior to the APA, are an anachronism in the context of informal rulemaking.

These agencies are utilizing a pre-APA decisionmaking process to determine if the regulation complied with the APA by building a record supplemental to the one developed during the rulemaking. These statutory exhaustion requirements enable covered agencies to take a second look at its own regulatory issuances.⁷⁸ While that process may be beneficial to the agency in building a record to demonstrate the rationality of their rules, it enables the agencies to cavalierly dismiss the requirements of the APA and RFA by ensuring those assessments are addressed in a formal adjudication after the regulation is promulgated. Due to the cost involved of essentially conducting two separate litigations (an adjudication within the agency and a challenge at the federal court level), small entities generally will be foreclosed from challenging an agency's RFA analysis. It certainly takes a courageous small entity to absorb the cost of dual litigation in order to get into federal court recognizing the likelihood that the original challenge before a federal agency will almost certainly favor the federal agency.⁷⁹ This severely undermines the rationale used by the drafters of SBREFA to mandate judicial review—the threat of a relatively quick, unbiased review of agency action in federal court would lead to improved compliance with the RFA. If an agency can avoid that (due to cost) in order to supplement its record ex post facto then the deterrent effect of judicial review is negated. Not surprisingly, CMS and the Agricultural Marketing Service remain two of the agencies that have had the worst record of complying with the RFA. As a result, the changes set forth in § 8(a)–(b) ensure access to judicial review of challenges to agency compliance with the RFA without having to exhaust any post-promulgation internal agency adjudication on the underlying rule.

The amendments could lead to piecemeal litigation on the final rule; judicial review on RFA compliance would then be followed at some later date by a challenge to the rationality of the rule. However, the response to this contention is the Supreme Court's finding that "procedural rights" are special, Lujan v. Defenders of the Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 572 n.7 (1992) and someone complaining of an agency's failure to comply with NEPA "may complain of that failure at the time the failure takes place, for the claim can never get riper." Ohio Forestry Ass'n, Inc. v. Sierra Club, 523 U.S. 726, 737 (1998). Given the parallels between the RFA and NEPA already appeals process to ensure small entity access to federal courts for RFA challenges. Therefore, these cases do not militate against making the change to the RFA.

⁷⁸The Chief Judicial Officer at the Department of Agriculture acts as the Secretary when hearing appeals pursuant to § 15(A) of the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act of 1937. If the Secretary thought the rule was irrational, the Secretary should not have issued it in the first instance. Upon further reflection, it is highly unlikely that the Secretary would find his or her initial decision to be irrational.

⁷⁹For example, the Chief Judicial Officer within the Department of Agriculture has, with one exception, never overturned the Secretary's regulation implementing a marketing order. And the only circumstance in which that was done was to benefit the largest central marketing organization of oranges and lemons grown in California (a marketing order that no longer exists).

recognized by the courts, then a challenge to agency compliance with the RFA can never be riper than it is when the agency promulgates the final rule, irrespective of whether the substance of the underlying rule requires review through some additional agency procedures.⁸⁰ Furthermore, the likelihood of duplicative litigation is constrained by the limited number of agencies at which further agency appeals are required to challenge a final rule. Finally, it is important to note that the agencies that can take advantage of this statutory exhaustion process are among the worst in complying with the RFA—the Agricultural Marketing Service (AMS) and CMS. Therefore, the benefits of speeding judicial review of RFA compliance and the need to protect the “special procedural rights inherent in the RFA” outweigh the costs to the federal judiciary of piecemeal litigation.

The amendments made in § 8(a)–(b) are not intended to authorize challenges to either the agency’s RFA compliance or the underlying regulation prior to the issuance of a final rule. Principles of exhaustion of administrative remedies remain the most prudent course by allowing the agency to correct deficiencies with its RFA compliance in the final rule. However, once the agency has had the opportunity to make corrections in the final rule, it seems foolhardy to allow the agency to get another crack at correcting its RFA compliance after issuance of the final rule. The amendment is intended to allow federal courts to do what they do best—review agency compliance with statutes governing agency decisionmaking. Federal courts will not benefit from any supplementation of the record because federal courts have nearly 60 years of determining compliance with the APA, more than 30 years of reviewing environmental impact statements under NEPA, and about 35 years of ensuring adequate agency release of information under the Freedom of Information Act. RFA compliance is no more difficult and additional agency adjudication under the principle of exhaustion past the final rule simply will be of no benefit to the court. Finally, recalcitrant agencies like CMS and AMS, rather than risking immediate litigation over RFA compliance, will take the initiative, to improve their RFA compliance during the rulemaking process.

Section 8(c) of the bill makes conforming technical corrections to § 611. The trigger for any challenge is modified from the date of final agency action to publication of the final rule.

Section 8(d) clarifies the Chief Counsel’s amicus authority. In the past, the Department of Justice has challenged the scope of the Chief Counsel’s brief on the occasions that the Chief Counsel has prepared a brief under § 612. In one instance (prior to the enactment of SBREFA), the Department of Justice questioned whether the brief could address the rationality of the rule and compliance with the RFA. The authors of SBREFA attempted to clarify this by authorizing the amicus brief to address the adequacy of the rulemaking record with respect to small entities. Given the changes being made in § 5 of H.R. 2542 concerning the promulgation of implementing rules by the Office of Advocacy, it is appropriate to specify that the Chief Counsel has the authority to address compliance with §§ 601, 603, 604, 605(b), 609, and 610 of the RFA.

⁸⁰ See National Ass’n of Homebuilders v. United States Army Corps of Eng’rs, 417 F.3d 1272, 1286 (D.C. Cir. 2005).

Section 9. Jurisdiction of Court of Appeals for challenges to rules implementing RFA

Section 9 recognizes that certain actions taken by the Chief Counsel may adversely affect the rights of small entities. The regulations concerning the implementation of the RFA, and any subsequent changes to those rules should be subject to judicial review by small entities that believe the rules do not properly implement the RFA. Any small entity would be entitled to challenge the Chief Counsel's decision pursuant to the requirements of the Administrative Orders Review Act, U.S.C. §§ 2341–51. Given the importance of these rules and their impact on federal rulemaking, a federal appeals court appears to be the most appropriate venue for review. In some instances, challenges to agency decisions, such as those concerning ambient air quality standards under the Clean Air Act or licenses for use of spectrum under the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, must be brought in the D.C. Circuit. It would be inappropriate to force small entities to retain counsel and prosecute an appeal solely in the District of Columbia. In addition to authorizing challenges to Chief Counsel regulations, § 9(b) also makes appropriate technical and conforming changes to the RFA and the Administrative Orders Review Act.

As already noted, the Department of Justice has argued that limitations should exist on the scope of the amicus brief filed by the Chief Counsel. The RFA simply represents one component of the necessary considerations for developing a rational rule as mandated by the APA. A limitation on the scope of the amicus brief would place the Chief Counsel in the odd position of arguing that the agency did not comply with the RFA but could then not draw the obvious conclusion—the procedural failure constitutes a violation of the rational rulemaking mandated by the APA. See Motor Vehicle Mfrs. Ass'n v. State Farm Mut. Ins. Co., 463 U.S. 29, 43 (1983); Citizens to Preserve Overton Park v. Volpe, 401 U.S. 402, 418–19 (1971). Furthermore, the analysis performed by the agency pursuant to the RFA can demonstrate that the rule itself is irrational even if the agency complied with the RFA. Thompson v. Clark, 741 F.2d 401, 405 (D.C. Cir. 1984). The Chief Counsel should not be prohibited from reaching conclusions of law concerning the rationality of an agency's rule in an amicus brief. Section 9(c) clarifies that the Chief Counsel has the authority in its amicus briefs to comment on compliance with the rationality of the rule as well as the procedures for complying with the APA and the RFA.

Section 10. Establishment and approval of Small Business Concern Size Standards by the Chief Counsel for Advocacy

In 1992, Senators Dale Bumpers (D-AR) and Malcolm Wallop (R-WY) were incensed at actions taken by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC) to increase fees for byproduct users of fissile material under the Atomic Energy Act. The NRC did not perform an adequate assessment of these fee increases on small entities as required by the RFA. In establishing these fees, the NRC utilized a different set of definitions than had been set by the SBA under § 3 of the Small Business Act. Senators Bumpers and Wallop sponsored an amendment to the Small Business Act requiring that federal agencies wishing to adopt a definition of small business that varied from those promulgated by the Small Business Administration (SBA) pursuant to its § 3 authority must issue the new size standard for notice and comment and then obtain approval of the Administrator of the SBA.

While the Administrator has significant acumen in setting size standards, that expertise is limited to the use of size standards for purposes of the Small Business Act and Small Business Investment Act of 1958. As a result, the Administrator is not the proper official to determine size standards for purposes of other agencies' regulatory activities. The Administrator is not fluent with the vast array of federal regulatory programs, is not in constant communication with small entities that might be affected by another federal agency's regulatory regime, and does not have the analytical expertise to assess the regulatory impact of a particular size standard on small entities. Furthermore, the Administrator's standards are: very inclusive, not developed to comport with other agencies' regulatory regimes, and lack sufficient granularity to examine the impact of a proposed rule on a spectrum of small businesses. When other agencies have sought the approval of the Administrator under the amendments made to § 3 of the Small Business Act by Senators Bumpers and Wallop, the Office of Size Standards consulted with personnel in the Office of Advocacy on the rectitude of an agency's definition of small business that varied from those set forth in the SBA's regulations interpreting the Small Business Act.

Given this rationale, it is appropriate to split the size standard functions in the Small Business Act. Section 10 of H.R. 2542 provides that the Administrator shall establish size standards to carry out the purposes of the Small Business Act or Small Business Investment Act of 1958. Section 10 then delegates the authority to approve a size standard for purposes of all other statutes to the Chief Counsel. The Chief Counsel is only entitled to rule on size standards for definitions of small business concerns if the agency issuing the regulation does not adopt a size standard approved by the Administrator for carrying out the purposes of the Small Business Act or Small Business Investment Act. This will constrain the number of size standard decisions by the Chief Counsel and allow agencies to utilize already established standards rather than have to go through the Chief Counsel for approval of each standard. If a federal agency adopts, as a definition of small business, a size standard approved by the Administrator, the federal agency need not seek approval of the Chief Counsel pursuant to § 3 of the Small Business Act as amended by H.R. 2542. The determination of a size standard for other regulatory purposes has no effect on the requirements of an agency that wishes to develop a definition of small business as set forth in § 601(3) of the RFA. Thus, there are two different size standard approvals that the Chief Counsel may be forced to make: 1) the size determination for analyzing the proposed and final rule pursuant to the RFA; and 2) the definition of a small business that may be included in the text of the final rule.

Nothing in the legislation requires that the agency promulgating a regulation must utilize the size standards in its rules for purposes of complying with the RFA. However, it would be logical for the agency to explain the rationale for adopting different definitions in the statement of basis and purpose as well as any FRFA or certification. To be sure, an agency may use a different definition of small business for purposes of compliance with the RFA if the agency adopts the Administrator's definition of small business in the rule at issue.

An alternative to the approach taken in H.R. 2542 would be for the Administrator to make all size standard determinations with the concurrence of the Chief Counsel on those size standards developed to implement statutes other than the Small Business Act or Small Business Investment Act. Adoption of that regulatory regime could lead to the anomalous result of the Chief Counsel and Administrator making different determinations on the same size standard. Under §601 of the RFA, the default size standard for agency compliance with the RFA are the ones adopted by the Administrator and set forth in Part 121 of Title 13, Code of Federal Regulations. However, the RFA permits the agency to utilize a different standard in complying with the RFA after consultation with the Chief Counsel for Advocacy. The agency then uses that standard for its initial and final regulatory flexibility analyses which results in the agency adopting a small business exemption identical to the definition of a small business in its regulatory flexibility analyses. Since that definition is different than the one adopted by the Administrator, the agency must seek the approval of the Administrator. If the Administrator disapproves that standard, then a small business exemption that the Chief Counsel and the agency thought was appropriate would not be put into effect.⁸¹ H.R. 2542 avoids these potentially anomalous results by vesting the Chief Counsel with the sole authority to make size decisions for the purposes of other regulatory programs.

Section 10(c) makes conforming changes in §3(a)(3). The Chief Counsel is added to ensure that size standards vary from industry to industry as is appropriate given the context of the rulemaking for which the Chief Counsel has been asked to approve a definition of small business.

The Chief Counsel's decision on size standards should be rational and subject to judicial review. Section 10(d) authorizing judicial review eliminates litigation over whether Congress intended a private right of action under Cort v. Ash, 422 U.S. 66 (1975), or whether the decision was left to the discretion of the agency pursuant to Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821 (1985).

To be sure, the Office of Advocacy could be placed in the odd circumstance of being a respondent in an action in which it is defended by the Department of Justice while at the same time filing an amicus brief against the Department of Justice on whether the agency complied with the RFA. Given the fact, the Chief Counsel's "intervention" in the RFA compliance aspect of the case is as an amicus rather than as a party, the Committee does not believe the odd litigation stance will prove problematic to the court reviewing the case or the Department of Justice's defense of the Chief Counsel. The odd alignment of defendants and friends of the court should not complicate judicial review because courts often face challenges in which one party challenging an agency action may agree with the agency in opposition to a stance taken by another party challenging the same rules. Despite the potential alignment of interests, the Department of Justice should be able to fulfill its obligations to defend the Chief Counsel on the size standard decision⁸² even though the Chief Counsel may be filing an amicus brief in opposition to the Justice Department's other agency defendant. Finally, given the nature of the claims and the record on review, the Department of Justice's defense of the action will reveal client confidences concerning the development of the rule to a "party" opposed to the rule.

Nothing in these changes made by H.R. 2542 are designed to authorize a specific challenge to the size determination made by the agency and the Office of Advocacy pursuant to § 601(3). To the extent that a party believes that the size standard utilized in complying with the RFA was unreasonable, the adversely affected small entity may challenge the agency's compliance with the RFA as set forth in § 611.

The changes made in H.R. 2542 will not represent a significant strain on the resources of the Office of the Chief Counsel for Advocacy. According to data from the SBA, there have been 27 requests by other agencies under the authority of amended section 3 of the Small Business Act since the date of amendment in 1992. That works out to between one to two requests per year. Even that may be an overestimate since the vast majority of requests were made by the Federal Communications Commission to implement its authority to auction spectrum under § 309(j) of the Communications Act of 1934, 47 U.S.C. § 309(j). Given that the number of such auctions will continue to diminish as the government runs out of spectrum to auction, the Office of the Chief Counsel for Advocacy should have sufficient resources to handle the authority transferred to it under this legislation.

Section 11. Clerical amendments

Section 11 contains appropriate clerical amendments needed to make the United States Code consistent with the changes sought by the Committee.

Section 12. Agency preparation of guides

Section 212(a)(5) of SBREFA requires agencies to prepare compliance guides for any rule for which a FRFA was prepared. Under the existing law, agencies may consult with small entities in the development of these guides. Section 12 requires agencies to solicit input from affected small entities or associations of affected small entities in the development of compliance guides.

Since small entities represent most of the entities subject to regulations, soliciting input from small entities in preparing compliance guides will help agencies to develop better guides. Small entities can identify potential compliance problems with a regulation in advance so an agency is able to address those problems in the compliance guide. This collaborative process will provide the agency with the best opportunity for obtaining full compliance from small entities by ensuring that the compliance guide is comprehensive and raises appropriate awareness of regulatory compliance requirements.

Section 13. GAO Report

Section 13 requires the GAO to examine whether the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration has the capacity and resources to carry out its duties under H.R. 2542. The GAO's study must be completed and published not later than 90 days after H.R. 2542's enactment.

VIII. CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET COST ESTIMATE

H.R. 2542 would amend the RFA to require federal agencies to provide more detailed analyses of the impacts of their proposed and final rules on small entities, including small businesses. The bill also requires federal agencies to seek out the input of small entities prior to publication of significant proposed rules. Finally, the legislation revises the already extant requirement of agencies to review periodically their existing regulations.

Based on information from the Office of the Chief Counsel for Advocacy and other agencies, the Congressional Budget Office estimates that implementing H.R. 2542 would cost $45 million over the 2014–2018 period subject to appropriation of the necessary amounts. Pay-as-you-go procedures apply to this legislation because it could affect direct spending by agencies not funded through annual appropriations.

Chairman, Committee on Small Business,
House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

Sincerely,

DOUGLAS W. ELMENDORF.

H.R. 2542—Regulatory Flexibility Improvements Act of 2013

Summary: H.R. 2542 would amend the Regulatory Flexibility Act (RFA) to expand the number of rules covered by the act and to require agencies to perform additional analysis of regulations that affect small businesses. The legislation also would provide new authorities to the Small Business Administration's (SBA's) Office of Advocacy to intervene and provide support for agency rulemaking. Finally, H.R. 2542 would require the Government Accountability Office (GAO) to report on the implementation of the legislation.

CBO estimates that implementing H.R. 2542 would cost $45 million over the 2014–2018 period, assuming appropriation of the necessary funds. Enacting the bill could affect direct spending by agencies not funded through annual appropriations; therefore, pay-as-you-go procedures apply. CBO estimates, however, that any net increase in spending by those agencies would not be significant. Enacting H.R. 2542 would not affect revenues.

H.R. 2542 contains no intergovernmental or private-sector mandates as defined in the Unfunded Mandates Reform Act (UMRA) and would not affect the budgets of state, local, or tribal governments.

Estimated cost to the Federal Government: The estimated budgetary impact of H.R. 2542 is shown in the following table. The costs of this legislation fall within budget functions 370 (commerce and housing credit), 800 (general government), and all budget functions that include funding for agencies that issue regulations affecting small businesses.

	By fiscal year, in millions of dollars—
	2014	2015	2016	2017	2018	2014–2018
CHANGES IN SPENDING SUBJECT TO APPROPRIATION
Estimated Authorization Level	5	9	12	12	12	50
Estimated Outlays	4	7	10	12	12	45

Basis of estimate: For this estimate, CBO assumes that the legislation will be enacted near the start of calendar year 2014, that the necessary amounts will be appropriated each year, and that spending will follow historical patterns for similar activities.

CBO is unaware of any comprehensive information on the current level of spending for regulatory activities governmentwide. However, according to the Congressional Research Service, federal agencies issue 3,000 to 4,000 final rules each year. Most rules, regardless of size, are promulgated by the Departments of Transportation, Homeland Security, and Commerce, and the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA). Most major rules (those with an estimated economic impact on the economy of more than $100 million per year) are issued by the Departments of Health and Human Services and Agriculture and EPA.

H.R. 2542 would broaden the definition of a “rule” for rule-making purposes to include agency guidance documents and policy statements. The bill also would expand the scope of the regulatory analysis for proposed and final rules to include an examination of indirect economic effects on small businesses and a more detailed analysis of the possible economic consequences of the rule for small businesses and allow the analysis to be provided to a requesting small business. The legislation defines indirect economic effects as any impact that is reasonably foreseeable. The legislation also would require agencies to prepare reports on the cumulative economic impact on small businesses of new and existing regulations.

Implementing H.R. 2542 would increase the amount of regulatory analysis that agencies would need to prepare, and it would expand the role of the SBA’s Office of Advocacy and the Office of Management and Budget’s Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs (OIRA) in the rulemaking process. Finally, the legislation would require more federal agencies to use panels of experts to evaluate regulations and to prepare reports on the economic impact of proposed regulations on small business.

Information from OIRA, SBA, and some federal agencies indicates that the new requirements would increase the cost to issue a few hundred of the thousands of federal regulations issued annually. Based on that information, CBO estimates that administrative costs in some regulatory agencies, the SBA's Office of Advocacy, and OIRA would increase by a total of about $12 million annually, subject to the availability of appropriated funds. We expect that it would take about three years to reach that level of effort. The GAO report would cost less than $500,000 to complete in fiscal year 2014.

Pay-As-You-Go Considerations: The Statutory Pay-As-You-Go Act of 2010 establishes budget-reporting and enforcement procedures for legislation affecting direct spending or revenues. Enacting H.R. 2542 could affect direct spending by agencies not funded through annual appropriations; therefore, pay-as-you-go procedures apply. CBO estimates, however, that any net increase in spending by those agencies would not be significant.

Intergovernmental and private-sector impact: H.R. 2542 contains no intergovernmental or private-sector mandates as defined in UMRA and would not affect the budgets of state, local, or tribal governments.

Previous CBO estimate: On September 5, 2013, CBO transmitted a cost estimate for H.R. 2542 as ordered reported by the House Committee on the Judiciary on July 31, 2013. Both versions of the bill contain similar provisions regarding amending the Regulatory Flexibility Act and the estimated costs are the same.

Estimate prepared by: Federal Spending: Matthew Pickford and Susan Willie; Impact on State, Local, and Tribal Governments: Melissa Merrell; Impact on the Private Sector: Paige Piper/Bach.

Estimate approved by: Theresa A. Gullo, Deputy Assistant Director for Budget Analysis.

IX. UNFUNDED MANDATES

H.R. 2542 contains no intergovernmental or private-sector mandates as defined in the Unfunded Mandates Reform Act, Pub. L. No. 104-4, and would impose no costs on state, local or tribal governments.

X. NEW BUDGET AUTHORITY, ENTITLEMENT AUTHORITY, AND TAX EXPENDITURES

In compliance with clause 3(c)(2) of rule XIII of the Rules of the House, the Committee provides the following opinion and estimate with respect to new budget authority, entitlement authority and tax expenditures.

The Committee does not adopt as its own the estimate of new budget authority contained in the cost estimate prepared by the Director of the Congressional Budget Office pursuant to § 402 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

The Committee believes that the cost estimate provided by the Congressional Budget Office exhibits a serious misunderstanding of the rulemaking process. Consequently, the cost estimate significantly overestimates the cost of complying with the new requirements of H.R. 2542.

First, the Congressional Budget Office admits that there are no credible studies on the actual cost of writing federal regulations. The conclusion is buttressed by a review of federal appropriations legislation which does not specifically allocate funds to the writing and drafting of regulations.

Second, the Congressional Budget Office's cost estimate is primarily based on the use of prepublication panels in §6 of H.R. 2542. Under H.R. 2542, the prepublication panel requirement, which currently only applies to CFPB, EPA and OSHA, would be extended to all agencies. The CBO asserts that federal agencies will be required to use "panels of experts to evaluate regulations." This misstates who participates in the prepublication panel process. The participants in the panel process include small business representatives and a panel of government employees which includes a representative from the covered agency, a representative from the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs and a representative of the Office of Advocacy. The prepublication panel requirement is an outreach tool that allows agencies to get input on regulatory proposals that are under development from affected small businesses. Agencies identify small businesses that will be affected by the regulatory proposal and small businesses provide the agency with recommendations on how to reduce adverse or increase positive consequences of the proposed rule on small businesses. The small business recommendations must be included in a report that is published along with the proposed rule. Agencies already have extant procedures to gather input from interested parties on regulations according to the plans developed in response to E.O. 13,563 and executed pursuant to E.O. 13,610. For example, at a May 8, 2013 hearing before the Committee, the Under Secretary for Policy of the Department of Transportation testified that they have been conducting outreach through Department-wide public meetings and utilizing existing advisory committees to engage with the public and address small business concerns. The prepublication panel requirement simply codifies existing outreach procedures and ensures that the input of small businesses on a particular regulatory proposal is memorialized. Thus, the Committee does not believe that the type of outreach required adds any cost to the process of writing regulations since agencies are already conducting outreach pursuant to E.O.'s 13,563 and 13,610. Furthermore, the Chief Counsel for Advocacy analyzes proposed rules that affect small businesses already. Preparing the panel reports simply would move the process to a different point in that Office's normal course of business in reviewing regulations published in the Federal Register.

Third, federal agencies would be required to examine the indirect effects of significant rules, conduct more detailed analyses of the possible economic consequences of significant rules and evaluate the cumulative economic impact of rules on small businesses under H.R. 2542. While the Congressional Budget Office suggests the fact that these requirements will increase costs, the Committee disputes that conclusion. Agencies are already required to estimate indirect effects for and conduct an assessment of the costs and benefits of regulations that are subject to the strictures of E.O. 12,866. Agencies also already are estimating the indirect effects, including economic impacts, of some of their regulations to comply with the National Environmental Policy Act. Furthermore, agencies are already required to take into consideration cumulative effects of regulations under E.O. 13,610. Thus, the Committee believes that there will be significant overlap between the regulatory analysis already done by agencies and what is required for H.R. 2542. This substantially undermines the rationale for this portion of CBO's cost estimate.

Fourth, agencies (other than independent collegial bodies) are reviewing their existing regulations to comply with E.O.'s 13,563 and 13,610. Agencies published their final retrospective review plans in August 2011 to comply with E.O. 13,563. Subsequently, E.O. 13,610, which supplemented E.O. 13,563, was issued to institutionalize regular assessment of significant regulations. In response to a question from Chairman Graves at a September 21, 2011 hearing on implementation of E.O. 13,563, then Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs Administrator Sunstein stated that the agencies could conduct the review of all existing federal regulations, including outreach to the regulated community, under current budgetary constraints. The current Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs Administrator was asked, in a question for the record following a July 24, 2013 hearing, to explain how agencies are both doing their existing work and conducting retrospective reviews. Administrator Shelanski responded by stating that, "agencies are prioritizing their regulatory work based upon their respective agency goals and priorities, as well as guidance provided by the President's Executive Orders." If agencies are capable of conducting retrospective reviews within their existing budgetary constraints and able to prioritize the reviews along with their goals and priorities, there should not be a significant cost to comply with the requirements of H.R. 2542, i.e. agencies can comply with the new analytical requirements within existing budget constraints.

For the foregoing reasons, the Committee does not adopt the cost estimate provided by the Congressional Budget Office and believes that agencies will be able to comply with the requirements of H.R. 2542 by utilizing the procedures and analysis that is already used to comply with Executive Orders 12,866, 13,563, and 13,610. The bill does not contain any new entitlement authority, tax expenditures, or tax revenue.

XI. OVERSIGHT FINDINGS

In accordance with clause (2)(b)(1) of rule X of the Rules of the House, the oversight findings and recommendations of the Committee on Small Business with respect to the subject matter contained in H.R. 2542 are incorporated into the descriptive portions of this report.

XII. STATEMENT OF CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY

Pursuant to clause 3(d)(1) of rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives, the Committee finds that the authority for this legislation in Art. I, §8, cls. 1, 3, and 18; Art. IV, §3, cl. 2, and the Sixteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

XIII. CONGRESSIONAL ACCOUNTABILITY ACT

H.R. 2542 does not relate to the terms and conditions of employment or access to public services or accommodations within the meaning of § 102(b)(3) of Pub. L. No. 104-1.

XIV. FEDERAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE STATEMENT

H.R. 2542 does not establish or authorize the establishment of any new advisory committees as that term is defined in the Federal Advisory Committee Act, 5 U.S.C. App. 2.

XV. STATEMENT OF NO EARMARKS

Pursuant to clause 9 of rule XXI, H.R. 2542 does not contain any congressional earmarks, limited tax benefits or limited tariff benefits as defined in subsections (e), (f) or (g) of clause 9 of rule XXI of the Rules of the House.

XVI. STATEMENT OF DUPLICATION OF FEDERAL PROGRAMS

Pursuant to clause 3(c) of rule XIII of the Rules of the House, no provision of H.R. 2542 establishes or reauthorizes a program of the federal government known to be duplicative of another Federal program, a program that was included in any report from the GAO pursuant to Section 21 of Public Law 111-139, or a program related to a program identified in the most recent Catalog of Federal Domestic Assistance.

XVII. DISCLOSURE OF DIRECTED RULE MAKINGS

Pursuant to clause 3(c) of rule XIII of the Rules of the House, H.R. 2542 requires the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration to develop and issue regulations related to RFA compliance. The Chief Counsel is required, after an opportunity for notice and comment, to issue regulations not later than 270 days after the date of enactment of the legislation to govern federal agency compliance with Chapter 6 of Title 5 of the United States Code. This ensures, as stated elsewhere in the report, that agencies implement the RFA in a consistent manner.

XVIII. PERFORMANCE GOALS AND OBJECTIVES

Pursuant to clause 3(c)(4) of rule XIII of the Rules of the House, the Committee establishes the following performance related goals and objectives for this legislation:

H.R. 2542 includes a number of provisions designed to strengthen agency compliance with the Regulatory Flexibility Act, reduce confusion among agencies concerning compliance with the Regulatory Flexibility Act and streamline determinations associated with size standards for the purposes of statutes other than the Small Business Act and Small Business Investment Act of 1958.

XIX. CHANGES IN EXISTING LAW MADE BY THE BILL, AS REPORTED

In compliance with clause 3(e) of rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives, changes in existing law made by the bill, as reported, are shown as follows (existing law proposed to be omitted is enclosed in black brackets, new matter is printed in italic, existing law in which no change is proposed is shown in roman):

§ 602. Regulatory agenda

The initial regulatory flexibility analysis or a summary shall be published in the Federal Register at the time of the publication of general notice of proposed rulemaking for the rule. The agency shall transmit a copy of the initial regulatory flexibility analysis to the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration. In the case of an interpretative rule involving the internal revenue laws of the United States, this chapter applies to interpretative rules published in the Federal Register for codification in the Code of Federal Regulations, but only to the extent that such interpretative rules impose on small entities a collection of information requirement[.] or a recordkeeping requirement, and without regard to whether such requirement is imposed by statute or regulation.

tities. Consistent with the stated objectives of applicable statutes, the analysis shall discuss significant alternatives such as—

(1) * * *

* * * * *

[(d)(1) For a covered agency, as defined in section 609(d)(2), each initial regulatory flexibility analysis shall include a description of—

[(A) any projected increase in the cost of credit for small entities;

§ 604. Final regulatory flexibility analysis

(a) When an agency promulgates a final rule under section 553 of this title, after being required by that section or any other law to publish a general notice of proposed rulemaking, [or] promulgates a final interpretative rule involving the internal revenue laws of the United States as described in section 603(a), or adopts a revision or amendment to a land management plan, the agency shall prepare a final regulatory flexibility analysis. Each final regulatory flexibility analysis shall contain—

[§ 605. Avoidance of duplicative or unnecessary analyses]

§ 605. Incorporations by reference and certifications

[(a) Any Federal agency may perform the analyses required by sections 602, 603, and 604 of this title in conjunction with or as a part of any other agenda or analysis required by any other law if such other analysis satisfies the provisions of such sections.]

(a) A Federal agency shall be treated as satisfying any requirement regarding the content of an agenda or regulatory flexibility analysis under section 602, 603, or 604, if such agency provides in such agenda or analysis a cross-reference to the specific portion of another agenda or analysis which is required by any other law and which satisfies such requirement.

(b) Sections 603 and 604 of this title shall not apply to any proposed or final rule if the head of the agency certifies that the rule will not, if promulgated, have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities. If the head of the agency makes a certification under the preceding sentence, the agency shall publish such certification in the Federal Register at the time of publication of general notice of proposed rulemaking for the rule or at the time of publication of the final rule, along with a detailed statement providing the factual and legal basis for such certification. * * * * *

[§ 607. Preparation of analyses]

[In complying with the provisions of sections 603 and 604 of this title, an agency may provide either a quantifiable or numerical description of the effects of a proposed rule or alternatives to the proposed rule, or more general descriptive statements if quantification is not practicable or reliable.]

¶ 608. Procedure for waiver or delay of completion

[(a) An agency head may waive or delay the completion of some or all of the requirements of section 603 of this title by publishing in the Federal Register, not later than the date of publication of the final rule, a written finding, with reasons therefor, that the final rule is being promulgated in response to an emergency that makes compliance or timely compliance with the provisions of section 603 of this title impracticable.

[(b) Except as provided in section 605(b), an agency head may not waive the requirements of section 604 of this title. An agency head may delay the completion of the requirements of section 604 of this title for a period of not more than one hundred and eighty days after the date of publication in the Federal Register of a final rule by publishing in the Federal Register, not later than such date of publication, a written finding, with reasons therefor, that the final rule is being promulgated in response to an emergency that makes timely compliance with the provisions of section 604 of this title impracticable. If the agency has not prepared a final regulatory analysis pursuant to section 604 of this title within one hundred and eighty days from the date of publication of the final rule, such rule shall lapse and have no effect. Such rule shall not be repromulgated until a final regulatory flexibility analysis has been completed by the agency.]

§ 607. Quantification requirements

In complying with sections 603 and 604, an agency shall provide—

- (1) a quantifiable or numerical description of the effects of the proposed or final rule and alternatives to the proposed or final rule; or*
- (2) a more general descriptive statement and a detailed statement explaining why quantification is not practicable or reliable.*

§ 608. Additional powers of Chief Counsel for Advocacy

(a)(1) Not later than 270 days after the date of the enactment of the Regulatory Flexibility Improvements Act of 2013, the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration shall, after opportunity for notice and comment under section 553, issue rules governing agency compliance with this chapter. The Chief Counsel may modify or amend such rules after notice and comment under section 553. This chapter (other than this subsection) shall not apply with respect to the issuance, modification, and amendment of rules under this paragraph.

(2) An agency shall not issue rules which supplement the rules issued under subsection (a) unless such agency has first consulted with the Chief Counsel for Advocacy to ensure that such supplemental rules comply with this chapter and the rules issued under paragraph (1).

(b) Notwithstanding any other law, the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration may intervene in any agency adjudication (unless such agency is authorized to impose a fine or penalty under such adjudication), and may inform the agency of the impact that any decision on the record may have on small entities. The Chief Counsel shall not initiate an appeal with respect to any adjudication in which the Chief Counsel intervenes under this subsection.

(c) The Chief Counsel for Advocacy may file comments in response to any agency notice requesting comment, regardless of whether the agency is required to file a general notice of proposed rulemaking under section 553.

§ 609. Procedures for gathering comments

(a) * * *

[(b) Prior to publication of an initial regulatory flexibility analysis which a covered agency is required to conduct by this chapter—

[(1) a covered agency shall notify the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration and provide the Chief Counsel with information on the potential impacts of the proposed rule on small entities and the type of small entities that might be affected;

[(2) not later than 15 days after the date of receipt of the materials described in paragraph (1), the Chief Counsel shall identify individuals representative of affected small entities for the purpose of obtaining advice and recommendations from those individuals about the potential impacts of the proposed rule;

[(3) the agency shall convene a review panel for such rule consisting wholly of full time Federal employees of the office within the agency responsible for carrying out the proposed rule, the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs within the Office of Management and Budget, and the Chief Counsel;

[(4) the panel shall review any material the agency has prepared in connection with this chapter, including any draft proposed rule, collect advice and recommendations of each individual small entity representative identified by the agency after consultation with the Chief Counsel, on issues related to subsections 603(b), paragraphs (3), (4) and (5) and 603(c);

[(5) not later than 60 days after the date a covered agency convenes a review panel pursuant to paragraph (3), the review panel shall report on the comments of the small entity representatives and its findings as to issues related to subsections 603(b), paragraphs (3), (4) and (5) and 603(c), provided that such report shall be made public as part of the rulemaking record; and

[(6) where appropriate, the agency shall modify the proposed rule, the initial regulatory flexibility analysis or the decision on whether an initial regulatory flexibility analysis is required.

[(c) An agency may in its discretion apply subsection (b) to rules that the agency intends to certify under subsection 605(b), but the agency believes may have a greater than de minimis impact on a substantial number of small entities.

[(d) For purposes of this section, the term “covered agency” means—

[(1) the Environmental Protection Agency;

[(2) the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau of the Federal Reserve System; and

[(3) the Occupational Safety and Health Administration of the Department of Labor.

[(e) The Chief Counsel for Advocacy, in consultation with the individuals identified in subsection (b)(2), and with the Administrator of the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs within the Office of Management and Budget, may waive the requirements of subsections (b)(3), (b)(4), and (b)(5) by including in the rulemaking record a written finding, with reasons therefor, that those requirements would not advance the effective participation of small entities in the rulemaking process. For purposes of this subsection, the factors to be considered in making such a finding are as follows:

[(1) In developing a proposed rule, the extent to which the covered agency consulted with individuals representative of affected small entities with respect to the potential impacts of the rule and took such concerns into consideration.

[(2) Special circumstances requiring prompt issuance of the rule.

[(3) Whether the requirements of subsection (b) would provide the individuals identified in subsection (b)(2) with a competitive advantage relative to other small entities.]

(b)(1) Prior to publication of any proposed rule described in subsection (e), an agency making such rule shall notify the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration and provide the Chief Counsel with—

(A) all materials prepared or utilized by the agency in making the proposed rule, including the draft of the proposed rule; and

(B) information on the potential adverse and beneficial economic impacts of the proposed rule on small entities and the type of small entities that might be affected.

(2) An agency shall not be required under paragraph (1) to provide the exact language of any draft if the rule—

(A) relates to the internal revenue laws of the United States; or

(B) is proposed by an independent regulatory agency (as defined in section 3502(5) of title 44).

(c) Not later than 15 days after the receipt of such materials and information under subsection (b), the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration shall—

(1) identify small entities or representatives of small entities or a combination of both for the purpose of obtaining advice, input, and recommendations from those persons about the potential economic impacts of the proposed rule and the compliance of the agency with section 603; and

(2) convene a review panel consisting of an employee from the Office of Advocacy of the Small Business Administration, an employee from the agency making the rule, and in the case of an agency other than an independent regulatory agency (as defined in section 3502(5) of title 44), an employee from the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs of the Office of Management and Budget to review the materials and information provided to the Chief Counsel under subsection (b).

(d)(1) Not later than 60 days after the review panel described in subsection (c)(2) is convened, the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration shall, after consultation with the members of such panel, submit a report to the agency and, in the case of an agency other than an independent regulatory agency (as defined in section 3502(5) of title 44), the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs of the Office of Management and Budget.

(2) Such report shall include an assessment of the economic impact of the proposed rule on small entities, including an assessment of the proposed rule's impact on the cost that small entities pay for energy, an assessment of the proposed rule's impact on start-up costs for small entities, and a discussion of any alternatives that will minimize adverse significant economic impacts or maximize beneficial significant economic impacts on small entities.

(3) Such report shall become part of the rulemaking record. In the publication of the proposed rule, the agency shall explain what actions, if any, the agency took in response to such report.

(e) A proposed rule is described by this subsection if the Administrator of the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs of the Office of Management and Budget, the head of the agency (or the delegatee of the head of the agency), or an independent regulatory agency determines that the proposed rule is likely to result in—

(1) an annual effect on the economy of $100,000,000 or more;

(2) a major increase in costs or prices for consumers, individual industries, Federal, State, or local governments, tribal organizations, or geographic regions;

(3) significant adverse effects on competition, employment, investment, productivity, innovation, or on the ability of United States-based enterprises to compete with foreign-based enterprises in domestic and export markets; or

(4) a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities.

(f) Upon application by the agency, the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration may waive the requirements of subsections (b) through (e) if the Chief Counsel determines that compliance with the requirements of such subsections are impracticable, unnecessary, or contrary to the public interest.

(g) A small entity or a representative of a small entity may submit a request that the agency provide a copy of the report prepared under subsection (d) and all materials and information provided to the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration under subsection (b). The agency receiving such request shall provide the report, materials and information to the requesting small entity or representative of a small entity not later than 10 business days after receiving such request, except that the agency shall not disclose any information that is prohibited from disclosure to the public pursuant to section 552(b) of this title.

§ 610. Periodic review of rules

[(a) Within one hundred and eighty days after the effective date of this chapter, each agency shall publish in the Federal Register a plan for the periodic review of the rules issued by the agency which have or will have a significant economic impact upon a substantial number of small entities. Such plan may be amended by the agency at any time by publishing the revision in the Federal Register. The purpose of the review shall be to determine whether such rules should be continued without change, or should be amended or rescinded, consistent with the stated objectives of applicable statutes, to minimize any significant economic impact of the rules upon a substantial number of such small entities. The plan shall provide for the review of all such agency rules existing on the effective date of this chapter within ten years of that date and for the review of such rules adopted after the effective date of this chapter within ten years of the publication of such rules as the final rule. If the head of the agency determines that completion of the review of existing rules is not feasible by the established date, he shall so certify in a statement published in the Federal Register and may extend the completion date by one year at a time for a total of not more than five years.

[(b) In reviewing rules to minimize any significant economic impact of the rule on a substantial number of small entities in a manner consistent with the stated objectives of applicable statutes, the agency shall consider the following factors—

[(1) the continued need for the rule;

[(2) the nature of complaints or comments received concerning the rule from the public;

[(3) the complexity of the rule;

[(4) the extent to which the rule overlaps, duplicates or conflicts with other Federal rules, and, to the extent feasible, with State and local governmental rules; and

[(5) the length of time since the rule has been evaluated or the degree to which technology, economic conditions, or other factors have changed in the area affected by the rule.

[(c) Each year, each agency shall publish in the Federal Register a list of the rules which have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities, which are to be reviewed pursuant to this section during the succeeding twelve months. The list shall include a brief description of each rule and the need for and legal basis of such rule and shall invite public comment upon the rule.]

§ 610. Periodic review of rules

(a) Not later than 180 days after the enactment of the Regulatory Flexibility Improvements Act of 2013, each agency shall publish in the Federal Register and place on its website a plan for the periodic review of rules issued by the agency which the head of the agency determines have a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities. Such determination shall be made without regard to whether the agency performed an analysis under section 604. The purpose of the review shall be to determine whether such rules should be continued without change, or should be amended or rescinded, consistent with the stated objectives of applicable statutes, to minimize any adverse significant economic impacts or maximize any beneficial significant economic impacts on a substantial number of small entities. Such plan may be amended by the agency at any time by publishing the revision in the Federal Register and subsequently placing the amended plan on the agency's website.

(b) The plan shall provide for the review of all such agency rules existing on the date of the enactment of the Regulatory Flexibility Improvements Act of 2013 within 10 years of the date of publication of the plan in the Federal Register and for review of rules adopted after the date of enactment of the Regulatory Flexibility Improvements Act of 2013 within 10 years after the publication of the final rule in the Federal Register. If the head of the agency determines that completion of the review of existing rules is not feasible by the established date, the head of the agency shall so certify in a statement published in the Federal Register and may extend the review for not longer than 2 years after publication of notice of extension in the Federal Register. Such certification and notice shall be sent to the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration and the Congress.

(c) The plan shall include a section that details how an agency will conduct outreach to and meaningfully include small businesses (including small business concerns owned and controlled by women, small business concerns owned and controlled by veterans, and small business concerns owned and controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals (as such terms are defined in the Small Business Act)) for the purposes of carrying out this section. The agency shall include in this section a plan for how the agency will contact small businesses and gather their input on existing agency rules.

(d) Each agency shall annually submit a report regarding the results of its review pursuant to such plan to the Congress, the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration, and, in the case of agencies other than independent regulatory agencies (as defined in section 3502(5) of title 44) to the Administrator of the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs of the Office of Management and Budget. Such report shall include the identification of any rule with respect to which the head of the agency made a determination described in paragraph (5) or (6) of subsection (e) and a detailed explanation of the reasons for such determination.

(e) In reviewing a rule pursuant to subsections (a) through (d), the agency shall amend or rescind the rule to minimize any adverse significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities or disproportionate economic impact on a specific class of small entities, or maximize any beneficial significant economic impact of the rule on a substantial number of small entities to the greatest extent possible, consistent with the stated objectives of applicable statutes. In amending or rescinding the rule, the agency shall consider the following factors:

- (1) The continued need for the rule.*
- (2) The nature of complaints received by the agency from small entities concerning the rule.*
- (3) Comments by the Regulatory Enforcement Ombudsman and the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration.*
- (4) The complexity of the rule.*
- (5) The extent to which the rule overlaps, duplicates, or conflicts with other Federal rules and, unless the head of the agency determines it to be infeasible, State, territorial, and local rules.*
- (6) The contribution of the rule to the cumulative economic impact of all Federal rules on the class of small entities affected by the rule, unless the head of the agency determines that such calculations cannot be made and reports that determination in the annual report required under subsection (d).*
- (7) The length of time since the rule has been evaluated or the degree to which technology, economic conditions, or other factors have changed in the area affected by the rule.*

(f) The agency shall publish in the Federal Register and on its website a list of rules to be reviewed pursuant to such plan. The agency shall include in the publication a solicitation of public comments on any further inclusions or exclusions of rules from the list, and shall respond to such comments. Such publication shall include a brief description of the rule, the reason why the agency determined that it has a significant economic impact on a substantial number of small entities (without regard to whether it had prepared a final regulatory flexibility analysis for the rule), and request comments from the public, the Chief Counsel for Advocacy of the Small Business Administration, and the Regulatory Enforcement Ombudsman concerning the enforcement of the rule.

§ 611. Judicial review

(a)(1) For any rule subject to this chapter, a small entity that is adversely affected or aggrieved by final agency action such rule is entitled to judicial review of agency compliance with the requirements of sections 601, 604, 605(b), 608(b), and 610 in accordance with chapter 7. Agency compliance with sections 607 and 609(a) shall be judicially reviewable in connection with judicial review of section 604.

(2) Each court having jurisdiction to review such rule for compliance with section 553, or under any other provision of law, (or which would have such jurisdiction if publication of the final rule constituted final agency action) shall have jurisdiction to review any claims of noncompliance with sections 601, 604, 605(b), 608(b), and 610 in accordance with chapter 7. Agency compliance with sections 607 and 609(a) shall be judicially reviewable in connection with judicial review of section 604.

(3) [(A)] A small entity may seek such review during the period beginning on the date of final agency action publication of the final rule and ending one year later, except that, in the case of a rule for which the date of final agency action is the same date as the publication of the final rule, where a provision of law requires that an action challenging a final agency action be commenced before the expiration of one year, such lesser period shall apply to an action for judicial review under this section.

[(B)] In the case where an agency delays the issuance of a final regulatory flexibility analysis pursuant to section 608(b) of this chapter, an action for judicial review under this section shall be filed not later than—

[(i)] one year after the date the analysis is made available to the public, or

[(ii)] where a provision of law requires that an action challenging a final agency regulation be commenced before the expiration of the 1-year period, the number of days specified in such provision of law that is after the date the analysis is made available to the public.]

(5) AGENCY PREPARATION OF GUIDES.—The agency shall, in its sole discretion, taking into account the subject matter of the rule and the language of relevant statutes, ensure that the guide is written using sufficiently plain language likely to be understood by affected small entities. Agencies may prepare separate guides covering groups or classes of similarly affected small entities and may cooperate with associations of small entities to distribute such guides. In developing guides, agencies shall solicit input from affected small entities or associations of affected small entities. An agency may prepare guides and apply this section with respect to a rule or a group of related rules.

XX. DISSENTING VIEWS

BACKGROUND

In 1980, Congress enacted the Regulatory Flexibility Act (RFA) to respond to concerns that the uniform application of federal regulations imposed disproportionate burdens on small firms. In order to minimize the burden of regulations on small businesses, the RFA mandates that federal agencies consider the potential economic impact of federal rules on small entities. Federal agencies accomplish this goal by analyzing regulations for their impact on small businesses. In addition to these requirements, select agencies provide further outreach to small firms by conducting small business advocacy reviews (SBAR) panels.¹ The results of these interventions are used to tailor regulations in a manner that results in lower compliance costs for small firms.

By many measures, the efforts taken under the RFA have already been very successful, calling into question the need for additional RFA legislation in the first place. During FY 2012, the Office of Advocacy claims that efforts undertaken through the RFA yielded nearly $2.4 billion in foregone regulatory costs for small businesses.² Such results included regulatory savings across a wide-range of agencies including the Department of Labor, Department of Transportation, Environmental Protection Agency, and the Small Business Administration (SBA). It is notable that significant savings were achieved at a considerable number of agencies not subject to the SBAR panel process.

While the success of RFA is indisputable, the Committee has nevertheless pursued additional legislation in this area. In the 112th Congress, the Committee and the full House passed H.R. 527, the Regulatory Flexibility Improvements Act of 2011, but it failed to become public law. H.R. 2542, the Regulatory Flexibility Improvements Act of 2013, incorporates the House-passed version of H.R. 527 from the 112th Congress and combines it with H.R. 585, the Small Business Size Standard Flexibility Act of 2011, also passed by the Committee during the 112th Congress. Identical to its predecessor legislation, H.R. 2542 gives extensive new powers to the Office of Advocacy, imposes substantial requirements across all federal agencies, and does so at significant cost to the taxpayer.

IMPACT OF LEGISLATION

H.R. 2542 makes far-reaching changes to the Regulatory Flexibility Act (RFA) and its implementation. In doing so, the legislation makes it significantly easier for opponents to stop and delay the issuance of regulations throughout the government. As a result, federal agencies will face considerable obstacles in protecting human health, worker safety, consumers, and the environment.

It is also important to recognize that the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) scored the cost of H.R. 2542 at $45 million for the five-year budget window between 2014–2018 (note that the prior CBO estimate for this legislation in the 112th Congress was nearly double this estimate; this issue is discussed in detail below). However, it does not authorize any new funding for these new requirements. It is highly improbable that Advocacy's post-sequester budget of $8.5 million and staffing level of 46 employees will be sufficient to administer the additional responsibilities contained in H.R. 2542.

Impedes Health, Safety, and Consumer Protection Regulation

Taken together, the changes included in H.R. 2542 will create delays for agencies issuing regulations. The impact of these bureaucratic delays could be significant on individuals or businesses seeking immediate government action. For example, this could impede rules pertaining to food safety, consumer protection, health and safety, and veterans' assistance. It could also adversely impact rules that would protect families from fraudulent practices in the mortgage industry or safeguard children from toxic substances.

In this regard, Rep. Meng offered an amendment that would have specified that an agency does not have to comply with the requirements of the legislation if doing so would cause a delay that would result in a significant increase in the likelihood that children would be harmed. It was not agreed to by a vote of 11 ayes to 12 nays. By not including this amendment, regulations that would protect children could be delayed or made less effective. Rep. Hahn also offered an amendment to address public safety concerns with the legislation. Her amendment would have required that at least one small entity (or their representative) that would benefit from or whose health or safety would be protected by the proposed rule shall be included in a panel. The amendment was not agreed to by voice vote, thus preventing the full spectrum of small business perspectives to be considered during a panel. To ensure that the interests of small businesses, who can be both exporters and consumers, were incorporated into trade agreements, Rep. Chu offered an amendment to require the Office of Advocacy to convene a panel for any trade agreement that is approved by Congress. This amendment was not agreed to by a vote of 9 ayes to 14 nays. Its exclusion will limit the examination of trade agreements' impact on smaller firms. Rep. Murphy offered an amendment to exempts rules pertaining to the protection and rights of veterans from this legislation and it was agreed to by voice vote. Providing such protection will minimize the legislation's impact on veterans.

Further, the legislation requires agencies to analyze the indirect effects of proposed rules. This mandate would require wasteful new analyses that could be applied to virtually any action an agency attempts to undertake, no matter how unclear the connection is to small business interests. When added to the existing procedural and analytical steps that agencies must already take, the legislation would serve only to further delay rulemakings and make it nearly impossible for agencies to fulfill their mission of protecting the public. Rep. Clarke offered an amendment to address this matter and strike this new requirement, but it was not agreed to by voice vote. By failing to incorporate this amendment, the legislation maintains its broad mandate to incorporate indirect effects into RFA analyses, allowing opponents of certain regulations to seek further delays.

Fails to account for recent Executive Orders

In 2011, President Obama issued Executive Order (EO) 13563, calling for agencies to retrospectively review existing regulations. Shortly thereafter, EO 13579 was issued applying this requirement to independent regulatory agencies. In 2012, EO 13610 was issued to institutionalize these requirements and to increase public participation in the regulatory process. Though previously introduced and passed Committee and the House in the 112th Congress, H.R. 2542 has not been updated to accommodate the impact of these executive orders even though the Committee has held two Committee hearings this year. Testimony during these hearings on such retrospective reviews has shown that departments and agencies have produced more than two dozen regulatory review plans, with over 500 regulatory reform initiatives. Just a small fraction of the rules already finalized will produce billions of dollars of savings in the near term. H.R. 2542 duplicates these efforts unnecessarily, imposing new costs and complexity to address a problem that is already being addressed government-wide.

Puts the environmental and public lands at risk

The legislation applies the RFA to Bureau of Land Management (BLM) and U.S. Forest Service (USFS) land management plans. Land management plans address the need for restoration and conservation to enhance the resilience of ecosystems to a variety of threats. In order to protect and enhance America's water resources, plans proactively address adverse environmental impacts and emphasize the maintenance and restoration of watershed health. They also provide for the diversity of species and wildlife habitat and foster sustainable forests and lands and their contribution to vibrant rural economies. Applying the RFA to land management plans, would allow corporate interests, such as those engaged in the timber, energy, and mining industries, to challenge land management plans which restrict commercial activity in national parks and public lands. This could result in the exploitation of critical habitats and environmental resources.

Gives SBA's Office of Advocacy unilateral power to slowdown any and all regulation

The legislation will enable the Office of Advocacy to be involved in federal agency decision-making and not just on matters pertaining to agency compliance with the RFA as they are now. By broadening the Office of Advocacy's role in the rulemaking process, the balance between the office and federal agencies will change dramatically. To address this concern, Rep. Chu offered an amendment that would have allowed an agency to avoid convening a panel if doing so would inhibit an agency from carrying out its statutory duties. This amendment was not agreed to by voice vote. Similarly, Rep. Payne offered an amendment that would have prevented the legislation from being implemented until the Office of Advocacy certifies to Congress that it will not prevent agencies from taking appropriate and timely actions. This amendment was not agreed to by voice vote. By not incorporating either of Rep. Chu and Rep. Payne's amendments, the legislation will make it more difficult for agencies' to carry out their basic missions.

Currently, the office may simply file a comment letter on a particular proposed rule and the agency may or may not heed its advice. However, if H.R. 2542 is enacted, the Office of Advocacy will be accorded with judicial deference in interpreting the RFA, providing the office with substantial power to coerce regulatory modifications. This could adversely affect federal agencies ability to protect consumers, workers, and the environment.

Fails to account for the benefits of rulemakings and promote transparency

Federal rulemaking confer large benefits on society through increasing human health and safety. To this point, the Office of Management Budget (OMB) has estimated that the annual benefits of major Federal regulations reviewed by OMB from October 1, 2002, to September 30, 2012, for which agencies estimated and monetized both benefits and costs, are in the aggregate between $193 billion and $800 billion, while the estimated annual costs are in the aggregate between $57 billion and $84 billion. H.R. 2542, however, fails to recognize only costs of regulations and not the benefits they provide to the public. For these reasons, Rep. Meng offered an amendment that would have required that the initial and final regulatory analyses include a description and estimate of the benefits of the proposed rule to small entities. This amendment was not agreed to by a vote of 10 ayes to 13 nays. Rep. Meng offered an additional amendment on this subject that would have required each agency to estimate the benefits of the proposed rule and if they exceeded the regulation's costs, then the agency would not have to convene a panel under the RFA. This amendment was not agreed to by voice vote. Without either of Rep. Meng's amendments, the legislation fails to provide information concerning the benefits of proposed regulations for small businesses.

Along similar lines, Rep. Barber offered an amendment that will increase the transparency of the panel process. His amendment will require that the Office of Advocacy's report summarizing each panel include an assessment of the proposed rule's impact on the costs to startup a small business. This amendment was agreed to by voice vote.

Diverts scarce taxpayer dollars away from key priorities

Given the current fiscal situation and the recent sequester, it is hard to justify the diversion of limited taxpayer dollars to modify the RFA—legislation that is already producing impressive results. As the Office of Advocacy has stated, the RFA was successful in reducing small businesses' regulatory costs by $2.4 billion for last year alone. To fully assess whether the Office of Advocacy has the resources and capacity to carry out H.R. 2542, an amendment offerred by Rep. Clarke, and agreed to by voice vote, will require that the GAO to undertake a study to assess whether the Office has the resources to implement the legislation.

Taxpayer dollars should instead be used to restore the budgets of domestic programs that were hurt the most by the sequester. As noted, over a five-year period, it is expected that this legislation would cost nearly $50 million, while the true cost, based on prior CBO scores, is likely closer to $100 million. Such sums could be used to fully restore the budget to services essential to the creation of new entrepreneurial opportunities such as the SBA's Small Business Development Center, Women's Business Center, Veteran's Business Development, and SCORE programs. In an effort to mitigate the legislation's impact on women, minorities, and veterans, an amendment offered by Rep. Barber and passed by voice vote will require agencies conducting periodic reviews of regulations to reach out to small business owned by women, veterans, and minorities.

Finally, with regard to the SBA, H.R. 2542 could hurt the very entities that it is seeking to assist by delaying regulations implementing small business financing, contracting, and entrepreneurial development initiatives.

Creates excessive and unnecessary bureaucracy

This legislation splits the size standard functions in the Small Business Act. It provides that the Administrator shall establish size standards to carry out the purposes of the Small Business Act or Small Business Investment Act of 1958. It then delegates the authority to approve a size standard for purposes of all other statutes to the Chief Counsel of Advocacy. In practice, the Chief Counsel will approve size standards for agencies seeking to use a size standard other than approved by the Administrator for carrying out the purposes of the Small Business Act or Small Business Investment Act. Under current practice, if an agency seeks to use a different size standard it must get approval from the Administrator of SBA, unless specifically given the authority to do so in law. For RFA purposes only under current practice, an agency can use a different size standard if it consults with Advocacy and provides an opportunity for notice and comment in the Federal Register. Rep. Murphy offered an amendment to prevent this authority from going into effect unless the Office of Advocacy certifies it has the funding and personnel to carry out the section. This amendment was not agreed to by voice vote, creating a situation where the Office of Advocacy will be given new responsibilities, but without commensurate funding. Such a situation will cause the Office of Advocacy to reduce its efforts in core areas, including broadly advocating for the interests of small businesses.

Requiring Advocacy to take on size standard determinations, even in this limited capacity, will require them to deviate from their current mission of advocating for small businesses in the regulatory process. Approval of a size standard can be time consuming and require different skill sets than the Office currently has. In addition, adding this capacity at Advocacy would duplicate the SBA's Office of Size Standard mission. To put a finer point on these concerns, former Chief Counsel for Advocacy Frank Swain testified before the Committee that the Office of Advocacy should not take on the new responsibilities outlined in the legislation. To address this issue, Rep. Schrader offered an amendment to strike this new authority, which creates a duplicate sizes standard office in the Office of Advocacy and does not eliminate the existing SBA Office of Size Standards. This amendment was not agreed to by a vote of 11 ayes to 13 nays. By leaving this new authority in the underlying legislation, the SBA will have duplicative entities determining size standards. Such an outcome is a waste of taxpayer dollars.

In attempt to provide a more rational and budgetary-sensitive rollout of this legislation, Ranking Member Velázquez offered an amendment that would have required the Office of Advocacy to establish a compliance schedule that will determine when agencies shall become compliant with the new government-wide requirements to convene panels. The amendment would have required the Office of Advocacy to base its decision on the budgetary resources available to agencies and to the extent those agencies' regulations have typically affected small businesses. This amendment was not agreed to by a vote of 11 ayes to 13 nays. Without this amendment, the legislation will be implemented across the entire government at the same time, irrespective of agencies' budget situation. As a result, some agencies may not have the resources to implement the new panel requirements effectively and would do without the benefit of learning the lessons that would have come with a tiered implementation.

Does not provide agencies with flexibility to respond to disasters or acts of terrorism

The underlying legislation repeals section 608 of the RFA, permitting agencies to waive or delay completing an initial regulatory flexibility analysis in the event of an emergency. By doing so, the legislation could lead to situations where an agency would be blocked from responding to a tragedy quickly and effectively. Disasters are all too common and terrorism continues to be a threat. Ensuring that agencies are not unnecessarily prevented from helping the public or protecting the homeland in a timely manner should be a priority. For this reason, Rep. Clarke offered an amendment that would have specified that an agency does not have to comply with the legislation if the head of an agency certifies that a specific rulemaking is necessary either safeguard the United States and its territories in regard to an act or potential act of terrorism or to respond or prepare to respond to a disaster. This amendment was not agreed to by a vote of 11 ayes to 13 nays. Failure to include this amendment could lead to situations where regulations critical to disaster response or national security are unnecessarily delayed due to RFA proceedings.

SPECIAL NOTE ON CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE (CBO) COST ESTIMATE

The CBO provided a cost estimate for H.R. 2542 that found that the legislation would cost $45 million over a five-year period. However, this estimate is entirely inconsistent with prior CBO's scores and as a result seemingly unreliable for the purposes of floor consideration. During the 112th Congress, CBO provided a cost estimate for identical legislation passed by the Committee that was $86 million over a five-year period. The legislation, H.R. 527 and H.R. 585, is wholly contained within H.R. 2542. The only addition to H.R. 2542 is a provision that would place further responsibilities on federal agencies, thereby increasing the cost of the legislation further. CBO provided no rationale for this change in the cost estimate and did not provide any explanation when asked by Committee staff. Given the massive discrepancies and CBO's inability to provide clarification on this matter, CBO's cost estimate for H.R. 2542 is highly questionable and should be used with the utmost caution.

CONCLUSION

H.R. 2542 would dramatically expand the powers of the Office of Advocacy, including requiring the Office to issue RFA regulations, greatly increasing its role in judicial proceedings, and subjecting all RFA agencies to the panel processes. This would give opponents of regulations powerful tools to stop them. Doing so would leave many individuals, as well as the environment, without the protections that federal agencies are charged with providing. As a result, many regulations—including those related to consumer protection, the environment, and health and safety—would be delayed or, in the worst case, unimplemented.
